Let us consider what we have done to our own democracy. As a result of the passing of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974, for the first time since the medieval period a member of the Government has the power to exclude a person from one part of the United Kingdom. That has not been known since medieval times in Britain. Also, we have to walk into the House of Commons through various screening devices. There are wire fences around the House of Commons. People have to be searched. This change has been brought about during the last eight or nine years. It has had an effect on the legislation that is passed by this House. Look at what the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, which we shall be renewing again later tonight, has done to our reputation overseas. This House, which is the model for democracies around the world, has allowed, because it has failed to address so many of the problems that have arisen due to the division of Ireland, its democracy to be undermined to the extent that Britain has been found guilty before the European Court of Human Rights on more occasions than any other European country, and many of those convictions have been the result of problems or convictions stemming from Northern Ireland. There is a way forward. The people of Northern Ireland are much more able and willing to move than we think. We need to give them leadership and to recognise that that leadership has to come from London and Dublin.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: It may be convenient for the House to know that the Front Bench will seek to catch my eye at 7.20. A number of hon. Members wish to take part in the debate and perhaps they would make their own calculations.

6.40 pm

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Inevitably, this debate is a post mortem about the Assembly and, to some extent, it is also a post mortem about all the other initiatives that the Government have taken since 1972 in their attempt to find a political working arrangement for Northern Ireland. On looking back, it may be seen that the easy suspension of Stormont was one of the worst mistakes made about the government of the Province during all the years that it has existed as part of the United Kingdom.

It behoves all of us to ask ourselves why each of the initiatives has failed and failed so dismally. I do not suppose there is any one answer and certainly some of the speeches from Opposition Members are pertinent to those failures. The attempt to bend democracy that we first saw in the Northern Ireland Assembly Act 1973 and the creation of a power-sharing executive never really enjoyed the full-hearted support of the majority in Northern Ireland. That executive finally foundered as a result of the Sunningdale conference and the setting up of an All-Ireland Council. Those things showed that the attempt to force democracy to work because it seemed the most politically apt way to approach the problem was not likely to produce the results that we wanted.

The idea of power sharing has always remained somewhere in the Northern Ireland Office and it came alive again in 1982. The then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), believed that even if power sharing was a phrase that he dare not use—I am sorry that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) is leaving the Chamber because I shall refer to him in the course of my speech.

Mr. Hume: Very well, I shall stay.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: Nevertheless, my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney thought that he ought to seek something that looked like power sharing, and he decided to do it by introducing an Assembly that could devolve powers to itself, the powers that Stormont had once discharged, if 70 per cent. of the members of the Assembly gave their assent. He knew and the hon. Member for Foyle knew that that depended upon the presence in the Assembly of the hon. Member for Foyle and the other members of his party. They would have to be in the Assembly if the Assembly was to be effective.

I give full credit to the hon. Member for Foyle because he made it clear to my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney that he would have nothing to do with that Assembly and that he did not intend to take the members of his party to it, though he would fight the elections. That meant that the Assembly with its 70 per cent. veto—for that is what it was—would never have devolved powers because the hon. Member for Foyle did not choose that that should happen. No doubt he took that decision for good political reasons because, like the rest of us, he is a party politician and knows where his political muscle comes from. I do not criticise the hon. Gentleman for that because every hon. Member knows about these things. He knew that if he joined the Assembly he would not improve his political standing in the Province. By the same token, in order to improve his political standing, he stayed out of the Assembly.

There was another thought in the hon. Gentleman's mind, and I hope that he will forgive me because I am reading his mind. He may tell me that I am talking nonsense but that is his prerogative. The other thought in his mind was that the Assembly was not what he was after anyway. He liked the idea of an Irish dimension and looming into his sights was the concept of the new Ireland forum and the possibility that somehow, unbelievably, the Government of the Republic could be brought into a dialogue with Her Majesty's Government. It was an ambitious project and to set the Assembly beside it in comparison was to set a minnow beside a whale. He set about his task, and brilliantly achieved his objective. I give him full credit for that because he pursued his political aims and did what any one of us would wish to do—he achieved a remarkable political victory.

Mr. Hume: I am listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman's speech. He does not need to read my mind because I can tell him clearly what the position was. Ten years is not a very long time in a place like Northern Ireland. I remind the hon. Gentleman that during the 10 years before 1982 three attempts were made to devolve powers to Northern Ireland, and they were all based on fundamentally the same approach by a Government in this House. That approach was, essentially, power sharing acceptable to both sections of the community. Those three attempts all failed.

The most recent attempt was in 1979 and it was made by the right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) who was the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. At that conference we said to the Unionist parties, "Since you say power sharing does not work and will lead you into a united Ireland against your will, we will agree to it for the life of two Assemblies in order to demonstrate both points of view." They said, "There are no circumstances in which we will ever share power with you." Three years later another Secretary of State decided to do the same thing.

What sort of credibility would we have had with the electorate if we had accepted the same guidelines that we accepted three times in the previous decade when they were brought in for the fourth time? We said to the Secretary of State, "If you can get the Unionists to accept your guidelines this time, we will become involved." The Unionists rejected the guidelines before the Assembly election took place, thereby making it clear that the Assembly would not work. What did we do? We did the intelligent, honest, political thing and asked, "Why are they saying no? They said no because they were afraid of a united Ireland destroying their heritage. We then turned to the parties in the Republic and said, "Join us in showing that our future for Ireland threatens no one."

We followed the logic of the situation in which we found ourselves and we do not apologise to anyone for that. As the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) rightly says, the position that we find ourselves in today arises because of that, because we are facing up to the reality of the problem, which is about the interlocking relationships between the peoples of these islands and not just about the relationships in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Foyle for making such a powerful intervention. I respect him for that and, as I have said, I respect him for his political ability. I think he would have to agree that, despite what the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said about the Unionists not sharing power in fact, they have worked for power sharing. They did that in 1973 when they helped to set up the power-sharing executive. Mr. Brian Falkner led that executive, and they worked for power sharing again in 1982 when they and the Alliance party went to the Assembly. The hon. Member for Foyle and his party did not go.

Mr. Hume: For a very good reason.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: The hon. Member for Foyle says that it is the Unionists who have held up power sharing. I differ with him on that. He made his political judgment and decided that going to the Assembly did not suit his book. By creating the Anglo-Irish agreement at Hillsborough he must have known that he was carrying out the final act, giving the coup de grace to the Assembly, because once that treaty was in place the hon. Gentleman had created something else. He had created a new imbalance in Northern Ireland politics and, inevitably, that has led to the withdrawal of the Unionists from this House, and from the Assembly.

In his moment of triumph, when the Hillsborough agreement was signed, the hon. Member for Foyle could have taken an opportunity to give new strength to the Assembly and to the concept of community government in the Province. He could have led his supporters back into the Assembly, and, even if he did not agree with the Assembly as it was, he would have shown his willingness, having won his great victory over the Anglo-Irish agreement, to work for a community government in Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman did not choose to do so. Perhaps he was on a political high of a sort that few of us will ever experience. I do not want the hon. Gentleman to think that I am accusing him of doing something that was wrong, for I am accusing him of bad judgment. Whatever is the case, he has sentenced the Assembly to death and each one of us to thinking again about the political future of the Province.

Mr. Hume: Did the hon. Member attend the debate on the Anglo-Irish agreement? I made a clear and specific offer, and in every week since I have repeated it, to the Unionists, to sit down and discuss devolution in Northern Ireland without preconditions. I want to spell out to them in detail how we see the future and I want to hear from them what they see in our view that threatens them and, for the first time, how they see the future—I know how they see the past.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: I was at the debate. I interrupted during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and I sat here for two days but, sadly, was not called. However, I had the pleasure of listening to the hon. Gentleman. He knows that the Anglo-Irish treaty is fatally flawed. He knows that it cannot work effectively without the involvement of the majority community in the Province. He knows that, because that majority has never been consulted about the agreement, it is not exceeding its rights in saying that it will not work with it. It is doing no more nor less, I suspect, than the hon. Gentleman and his supporters would have done if they had been left out of an agreement of that gravity about their future.

Because of the flaw, each of us has the responsibility to try to find a way to put back that which was taken away. It is inevitable that, however important we may consider the Anglo-Irish treaty to be—no one would like to see it work more than me—we have to get those round-the-table talks. If the price of getting them is to set the treaty to one side for six months or whatever, then it is not too high a price to be paid. Nor is it impossible to do so. By the Vienna convention on treaties of 1971, articles 57 or 61, it is possible for a foreign country to set a treaty to one side or suspend it.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, will discuss this matter with the Taoiseach and say to him that, in our view, a community government in Northern Ireland that represented all the strands of that society would be a greater political gain than an Anglo-Irish treaty that we cannot enforce and that carries with it the seeds of strife, bitterness and violence stretching into the future.

I agree with all those hon. Members who have said that, in the end, Northern Ireland must govern itself. That is as it has to be. No English Secretary of State representing an English constituency can govern a province when his own party is not represented in it. Nor can those who come from Northern Ireland ever expect to have powers in this House. They cannot. It has been said, and I know it is true because I have worked and served in Northern Ireland, that it is a place apart. Its politics are different from those in the rest of the United Kingdom. But it is possible to create a community government, albeit with Westminster making the laws. If the treaty were set aside for six months or nine months — not an open-ended period — then political leaders such as the hon. Member for Foyle and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), and perhaps the Church leaders, could come together and realise that this is their chance to create something that would work, not something imposed by Westminster but something agreed among themselves. That gamble would be worth taking and I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that that is the line that the Government should take.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Various hon. Members have asked why all the constitutional initiatives that have been taken since 1969 have failed. Others have tried to suggest new constitutional initiatives, be they integration, partial integration or some version of the local government structures that we have on the mainland. With respect to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), his approach and that of all other hon. Members fails to take account of the lessons through which we have lived in Northern Ireland's recent past.

No constitutional mechanism and political structure will civilise Northern Ireland, bring equality to its people, make it a reasonable place in which to live or cause both communities to be able to live well together, unless there is a will to that end. Unfortunately, there is not that will in the Unionist community, which is why there has been continuous failure. They want domination, not equality. They do not want an end to discrimination or the equal provision of the local government services to which all people should be entitled. No constitutional dream or aspiration put together by the most clever constitutional lawyer in the world could put in that good will if it were not there. It is now clear to most hon. Members and to the people of Britain that Northern Ireland will never work because that good will is never there.

We have a new era. The people of Britain are completely exasperated. That feeling is reflected among hon. Members, who speak less openly in the Chamber than they do elsewhere about the exasperation with the Unionists, Northern Ireland and the way in which they are behaving. The people on the streets and buses speak more and more openly and their feeling is reflected in opinion polls. It is a growing and mounting feeling that Britain is doing no good in Northern Ireland and should get out because it is a waste of time, resources and lives. The British people do not want us to stay there any longer.

The Anglo-Irish agreement is and will always be an enormous historical turning point. Historians will see that clearly. The Unionists are right to say that, inevitably, the agreement will lead to an united Ireland. Their behaviour, their intransigence, their unreasonableness, their unwillingness to work with the agreement, have pushed the British people around that historical corner into a determination to withdraw from Northern Ireland.

Northern Ireland could have worked, following partition, if the Unionist community had behaved differently. Of course the Republicans did not want to see their country partitioned, but if there had been equality and not discrimination, and if Catholics and Protestants could have lived side by side and respected each other and their cultural and historical differences, things would have been different. People can live like that within the rest of Britain—that is the experience of my life. I come from a Catholic family that originated in South Armagh but I grew up in Birmingham and experienced full equality in a way that my cousins who still live in Northern Ireland could not.

Northern Ireland might have worked. Its people might have said that they were happy with the border, or equally the border might have faded away because the Unionists did not need it, because the two communities lived so happily in the north. Similarly, the Anglo-Irish agreement could have worked for the purposes for which the Government intended it—to help Northern Ireland to survive longer and to help generate co-operation and respect between the two communities. But the Unionists would not have it. They will not use any proposal that comes from the politics of Great Britain, to which they claim to be loyal. Each time their intransigence comes out; they say no to everything. They want to destroy every structure and every proposal. There can be agreement only if they are willing to give equality and respect to the massive minority community constituted by the Nationalists in Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Therefore, does my hon. Friend agree that the concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson), whose speech I listened to with much interest, are not realistic? He said that, if the Anglo-Irish agreement were suspended for six or nine months, the parties in Northern Ireland, and perhaps the Church leaders, might reach agreement, without it being imposed from Westminster. Have not years of history and experience shown that that is not possible? There is no way in which the Unionist and Nationalist parties will reach agreement, for reasons that my hon. Friend has been explaining. Therefore, does she agree that the agreement was an advance and should be maintained, and that in no circumstances should the Government give way on it?

Ms. Short: I agree with my hon. Friend that, if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Newbury were followed, it would be a complete disaster for Northern Ireland because Unionist intransigence and unreasonableness would have been victorious once again. The lesson it would teach the Unionists is that they should always be unreasonable and intransigent, that they should never give an inch, that they should never give respect or equality to the other community, and they will always win. I am afraid that that has been the experience of their history. They have to learn that it will not win. They must be faced down. I think that that is happening and that they are learning a bitter historical lesson that they will not get their own way this time, that the British people will not back off, and that they have to face up to the fact that they will not get their way again.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: If the hon. Lady has not already done so, she should read the report of the Northern Irish Convention to discover how much common ground there was among Unionists, the SDLP and the Alliance. She will be surprised. She will find that her speech is unbelievably prejudiced.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman now resorts to abuse. I respect the sincerity with which he made his speech, but his reading of history and of experience in Northern Ireland is wrong. I have explained why. If he simply wants to abuse me, it is no use my seeking to answer his point.

Mr. Mallon: In the interests of honesty and accuracy, I must point out that there cannot be equality, which is the real basis of what the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) has been saying, unless there is justice. The process of justice in the north of Ireland is not in the hands of the Unionists but in the hands of this Parliament. If we want equality in the north of Ireland, we must get it through the process of justice. It is on the Floor of this House and this Parliament and Government that we look for justice. Let us not blame the Unionists for that, although there is plenty for which we can blame them.

Ms. Short: I do not agree completely with the hon. Gentleman. The problems about the lack of justice and equal treatment before the law arise partly because some people in Northern Ireland are willing to use force to advance their political views. Their willingness to use force arises from the discrimination and inequality with which that community has been treated. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that many reforms are overdue and could be made by the House, but the whole answer does not lie here. Part of the problem that the House faces in Northern Ireland arises from the attitude of the Unionist community.

I want to put on record clearly my reading of the current situation; I believe that history will vindicate this reading. The absolute unreasonableness of Northern Ireland Unionism, shown clearly over the Anglo-Irish agreement, means that from now the determination of Britain to withdraw from Northern Ireland will grow. I think that most hon. Members know in their hearts that that is right. When we seek new structures we must bear that in mind. We must look for structures that can lead to co-operation between North and South and among all the communities of Ireland. Britain is pouring resources into the Army, the building of prisons and the employment of more and more policemen and prison officers. Those resources could be poured into building creative things that would make a better new Ireland and create jobs and services for all the communities. We should move as rapidly as we can to the construction of constitutional opportunities for that new Ireland to be built.

The real answer that will bring lasting benefits to all the people of Ireland is that new Ireland without Britain where the people have to live together in equality. I believe that it is coming soon because of the way in which the Unionist community in Northern Ireland has exposed itself to the British people so clearly in recent months.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in this important debate. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). Although I admire her sincerity, I do not share her vision or her analysis, particularly of the Unionist intransigence, as she called it.

I regret the disorder. Had I been here at the time, I believe that I would have voted for the original legislation. I regret that we are debating the order because it means that the Assembly has failed. The order was inevitable because the Assembly was being abused. In those circumstances, it was pointless to continue it, but it was not a total failure. As the Secretary of State pointed out, in its scrutiny capacity it achieved a certain amount of success, with 75 per cent. of its recommendations being accepted.

One reason why the Assembly failed was the failure of the SDLP to participate in it. To give the SDLP its due, its members always made it clear that they would not take their seats. My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) suggested that the SDLP should have gone into the Assembly post agreement. That would not have been realistic when the Assembly was being abused by other Members and was being hi-jacked for political protest. In those circumstances, I do not think that anyone could have expected SDLP Members to take their seats, so one cannot blame them for that.

I was heartened by the remarks of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) on 12 June when he said that he wanted to sit down to talk about devolution. I was heartened also by the remarks of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) in reply to my intervention. I believe that the hon. Gentlemen want to participate in devolution. When a new order is brought before the House to give effect to new elections, there may be a possibility of the essential prerequisite of all-party agreement on participation in the Assembly. Having heard what the hon. Gentlemen have said, I think that there is every possibility of them agreeing to go into an Assembly in the future.

There is scope for a new order. Do we want to resurrect the Assembly? I have always been in favour of devolution. I have always been suspicious of total integration and even of integration such as was talked about by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) because that approach would irretrievably alienate the minority in the North.

My preferred option has always been one of devolution. Northern Ireland has had devolution for the best part of five decades. It has not worked because there has not been the necessary element of justice or power sharing within it. But there is scope for devolution. I believe that that is the only way to involve the minority in public life in Northern Ireland.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) talked about Unionist intransigence over home rule earlier in the century. It is ironic that were it not for that Unionist intransigence—the minority intransigence—there would be a united Ireland with home rule within the United Kingdom. Many Conservative Members have that dream. I should like to see a united Ireland. However, it would be a different united Ireland from that envisaged by the hon. Member for Ladywood. I should like to see a united Ireland governed by Dublin with some form of home rule in Belfast. It would be a united Ireland with some form of loyalty to the Crown, perhaps as a dominion, certainly within NATO. That is why the devolution argument is so important. I believe that it is the only way forward. The only way the Unionists in the north would ever accept a united Ireland would be if that essential attachment to the Crown were retained in some form.

The Anglo-Irish agreement is the key issue; indeed, it is the only issue. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, I visited Ireland recently. One of the things that struck me, as it struck my hon. Friend, was the deep sense of betrayal, outrage and dismay. I sensed it in moderate, sensible industrialists—ordinary people from all walks of life. I came across it also at 1 o'clock this afternoon when I met the Minister of State and a party of industrialists. These moderate, sensible industrialists, who are at the sharp end of wealth creation, spoke about betrayal in a way they have not done before. They feel strongly about the agreement, but they feel even more strongly about the fact that they were not consulted before it was reached. I am reminded of a quotation from Hosea, chapter 4:

"My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee".

I believe that the cardinal mistake made by the Government whom I support was that they did not consult beforehand.

The Secretary of State made it clear that the Government will not renege on the agreement. Therefore, we must go forward on the basis that the Government will stand firm. I believe that there is only one way forward for Unionist parliamentary representatives. They must return to Westminster. I was heartened by the remarks of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh in that respect. They have a good case to argue, but they are not here to present it. The Prime Minister invited them to come and talk about devolution and the way forward for Northern Ireland. She invited them to discuss the future of the Assembly, but they turned down that offer. She invited them to talk about the conduct of Northern Ireland business in the House. That invitation was confirmed only a few hours ago by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State would like to see major changes. I should like the Under-Secretary of State to give us more details of what changes he wishes to see. Condemning Northern Ireland business to the early hours of the morning, incredibly anti-social hours, as happens now, is not heartening or encouraging.

We must face up to reality. I believe that there is a chance that the agreement can be absorbed into the democratic process, because the Government in power now are different in character from the Government in power in 1974. At that time, a new Government, with a small majority, came to power. The will to persevere just was not there. Today, the position is quite different. We have an extremely determined and strong Prime Minister. She will not give in.

Ms. Clare Short: She is on the way out.

Mr. Bellingham: I doubt that.

Another reason why I do not think that all hope is lost in terms of absorbing the agreement in the democratic process is that it provides an incentive to all politicians in Northern Ireland. Article 4 makes it clear that if there can be devolution in Northern Ireland, on a basis which secures widespread acceptance throughout the community, the role of the intergovernmental conference will be reduced, and certain functions that it is considering will not be apportioned to it. There is an incentive to make devolution work. I believe that Unionist politicians will see that there is an incentive to get devolution going.

There is another reason why it is in the interests of Unionist politicians to make the agreement work. There has not been much discussion about that, although there will probably be some later on. I refer to security, especially cross-border security. If it becomes apparent to the vast majority of Ulster people that there is progress on the security front and in the fight against terrorism, and if the people of Northern Ireland see that two of the factors in the progress are the agreement and the enhanced co-operation between the two Governments, a great deal of pressure will be placed on Unionist politicians. Last Thursday's events were a move in the right direction.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State was able to say that the talks that took place that Tuesday represented a significant landmark in co-operation. He said he was satisfied that we are embarking on a policy of much closer co-operation than there has ever been between police north and south of the border. Those are brave words if they are not true. I believe that they are true. From meetings which I have had recently with the RUC, I know that there is every indication that there has been a significant move in the right direction in the crucial fight against terrorism—against the enemy of all Ireland.

I say to the hon. Member for Foyle, before he leaves the Chamber—it is the second time he has been on his way out, to where I do not know—that Conservative Members feel that there is a need for his party to promote full-hearted support for the security forces in the minority community. Anything that he can do to boost the confidence of those security forces would be welcomed. That is probably what he intends to do. However, some assurances in that direction would be welcome. They would be welcomed by hon. Members who supported the agreement and those who have supported his conduct in the House over the past year or so. I ask the Minister whether he has any evidence of an increase in the commitment by the Republic Government in terms of resources for border security and border effort. I should be grateful if he would respond to that.

I recognise the pressure on our Unionist colleagues. Recently, at a meeting with a member of the Democratic Unionist party, I pointed out that the patience of my constituents was wearing thin and that I strongly believed that the word "loyalist" was being abused. He said, "Do you really expect me to put a noose around my neck just to put a smile on the faces of your constituents?" I know that the hard men are lurking in the shadows and the pressure that Unionist people are under. Surely the place of that member of the DUP is here at Westminster, so that he can put his case.

For example, during the crucial run-up to the decision on the Ministry of Defence contract for the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessels, where were the Belfast Members of Parliament lobbying Ministers and their fellow Members? They were not here. Where did their constituents want them to be—in Belfast demonstrating and protesting, or here in the corridors of power? I say to them, "For goodness' sake, you have a case to put. You cannot go on saying that the agreement is simply the result of terrorism succeeding." If they say that, how can they expect my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to give in to another form of blackmail? That argument flies in their faces. Their place is here. I urge them to return here and to argue their case with us.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I would not wish to follow the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) throughout his arguments, but I am sure that the House has taken note of his last comments on the absence of Unionist Members of Parliament, with the exception of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

One page of what I think is the last booklet from the Unionist camp—"Why Unionists Say No"—includes a quote from "The English Constitution":

> "The moment we distinctly conceive that the House of Commons is mainly and above all an elective assembly, we at once perceive that party is of its essence . . . party is inherent in it, is bone of its bone and breath of its breath."

I wonder why the Unionists would wish to quote such an important man as Walter Bagehot in relation to the House of Commons yet not take their seats here.

This debate has been one of the most interesting that I have heard in the Chamber in the past three years. It has highlighted the fundamental problem that faces the Unionist camp in Northern Ireland. That problem was amply reflected by the speech of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who sought to draw the Secretary of State on matters such as the administrative devolution of Northern Ireland and total integration. When I was a younger lawyer, we talked about negligence and gross negligence. A famous judge once said that they were both the same, except one had the epithet added. I surmise that the difference between integration and total integration is about the same.

We have not heard a great deal about an independent Northern Ireland, which is surprising. That proposal has been gathering pace in certain quarters, and I shall, therefore, not devote too many of my remarks to it. The difficulty faced by the Unionist leaders is that they seem not to be able to face up to the reality of the community in which they live. They cannot shed the vestiges of a colonial past. Because the Unionists cannot define a common line or goal, it is hardly surprising that the British public cannot understand what the Unionists want within the framework of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West touched on that aspect when he referred to one of his constituents.

The Unionists, in their own peculiar context, have created, if I may use the phrase from the World cup, "space and movement". It is a space into which others are likely to move in order to fill the vacuum. The movement in this country is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said, away from a belief that Northern Ireland has anything to do with the rest of the United Kingdom.

If I may interpret the Unionist position, it is essentially one of hostility to the Anglo-Irish agreement. That hostility is so irrational that, in the end, Unionism has punished itself. Bernard Shaw once said "If your face is dirty, you wash it; you don't cut off your head." The Unionists appear to have lopped off their heads without even looking into the mirror. They have set aside the Catherwood proposals, by which they set great store. They have wound up the devolution committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly. They have declined further to scrutinise legislation that comes before the House by way of Orders in Council. The Secretary of State referred to that work, saying that 75 per cent. of the Assembly's recommendations had been agreed by the House and by the Government. We feel that the Secretary of State might be somewhat beleaguered in his position on the Treasury Bench, but he has told the House and the country that he is an avowed Unionist. Even as early, or as late, as last November, he was urging the Unionists to make full use of the Northern Ireland Assembly. He told a meeting at Cambridge university that the Assembly was one of the best ways in which the Unionists could continue to have their views heard in London. That advice went unheeded. Apparently, the Unionists have not heeded the advice that he gave on 12 June to the House when he urged

"the Unionist parties to return to this House to argue their case and to take up the offer of . . . the Prime Minister to discuss . . .devolution . . . a round table conference; the future of the Assembly; arrangements for handling Northern Ireland business at Westminster". — [Official Report, 12 June 1986; Vol. 99, c. 505-6.]

The hon. Member for Eastbourne made cogent and well-constructed arguments when he challenged the Secretary of State to say what he thought of devolution, regional councils, and so on. The right hon. Gentleman told the House tonight, as he did on 12 June, that there could be talks without preconditions. I always understood that "talks without preconditions" meant exactly what it said. The Secretary of State clearly said that there can be no way forward for Unionists in Northern Ireland or for Northern Ireland on the route of integration. We welcome and support that statement.

The House must ask itself in these circumstances and in view of the Unionists' position why the Unionists have turned their backs on the proposals of Sir Frederick Catherwood who, when he published the last report of the devolution committee, made a call "To open negotiations on structures for devolved government on these bases and to consider practical amendments to the Northern Ireland Act 1982."

The bases to which he referred were devolved Government with a committee system, an executive and a Bill of rights —all, of course, built on a Unionist majority of some 70 per cent. in the Assembly. The only novel feature in a proposal which effectively would have meant a return to majority rule, devolved Government — in other words, "back to the future" — was a proposal to allow the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to sit in judgment on any measure which the minority community might think discriminatory.

Of course, that was a Freudian slip by Sir Frederick. We have long held the view that Northern Ireland is our last colony. It has been a colony with its own Parliament and governor, its own right to raise taxation, where Great Britain was responsible for external defence and for an annual subsidy to supplement public expenditure, but where this Parliament had no say in its internal affairs.

It was a colony unique in British history which had the right to send 12 Members of Parliament to Westminster, but they played no role here, participated in no Government, answered no questions on behalf of their constituents and put no questions to Ministers because their Government was elsewhere across the Irish sea. They had their Government in Northern Ireland. They simply exercised a watching brief, ensuring that Unionism was not eventually subjected to those pursuing the course of a united Ireland.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: As a matter of fact, under the Government of Ireland Act 1920 the House had full and unrestricted powers of legislation in Northern Ireland. The House did not exercise its rights and duties in respect of Northern Ireland for many decades because of a ruling of the Chair that it ought to be treated as if it were a dominion. That was not the consequence of the constitution of 1920.

Mr. Bell: The right hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of history, will know that a Privy Council decision in 1924 on the boundaries between North and South was interpreted in the House as meaning that the House had no responsibility and would not discuss legislation as it relates to Northern Ireland. That continued until 1969.

I shall briefly return to the proposals of Sir Fredrick Catherwood, which said that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the one to which I have just referred, had to be the final arbiter in matters which might relate to discrimination in Northern Ireland. If those proposals had been accepted, we would have placed Northern Ireland back into the context of a colony in the same position as other colonies and former colonies which still refer to the Privy Council as a final court of appeal.

We are not entirely sure who buried the Catherwood proposals. Have they been lost under the weight of the Anglo-Irish agreement or have they been jettisoned by the Unionists themselves who are turning away from the concept of a devolved Government? If they are turning away, how sincere were they in their document "The Way Forward" which was a Unionist response to the proposals in the All-Ireland Forum? That document stated:

"The Ulster Unionist Party takes the view that some form of devolved Government is necessary for Northern Ireland. In only one part of the United Kingdom, namely Northern Ireland, are major services subject to no real democratic control."

That commitment has apparently been washed out to a sea of lost opportunity by the Unionist reaction to the Anglo-Irish agreement. The Unionists are wont to rely on the so-called justice of their cause. My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood referred to that. That means that having had their way in the past they will be able to have their way in the future, to turn their back on history, the lack of consensus in Northern Ireland and the continuous and continuing erosion of civil liberties within a minority community. To continue with the sea metaphor that I used earlier, King Canute could not turn back the tide, and he never believed that he could. He simply went down to the beach to prove his advisers false. The Unionists can no more turn the tide to a recognition of minority rights any more than King Canute could. They should accept the Anglo-Irish agreement and stop trying to reverse what has already come about.

I wanted to speak about an independent Northern Ireland. That concept has been floated. It was looked at by the national executive committee of the Labour party in 1981. No one was particularly interested in it at that time. The consequences of such a possibility are so remote that perhaps I should not go into it now. Essentially, an independent Northern Ireland would mean the creation of a non-viable state. A majority for such a state would not be found within the six counties because two of those counties, Tyrone and Fermanagh, are already Republican in their majority. The forbearance of those in the north who consider themselves part of the Republic would be overstrained by the creation of an independent Protestant state and it could hardly be considered to be in the national interest of Great Britain.

How could an independent Northern Ireland exist economically? In this important debate it is necessary to lay to rest the prospect that somehow there could be an independent Northern Ireland, dependent, nevertheless, on our country which puts in about £1,500 million, inclusive of social security payments. Therefore, I doubt whether that concept will go far.

We have to treat the concept of integration seriously, and I believe that we do. On that matter I refer to the remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down. He has long put forward a view of integration with the rest of the United Kingdom. He has an able and, if I may say, powerful supporter in the hon. Member for Eastbourne. The right hon. Member for South Down has been representing a Northern Irish constituency since 1974. In that time he has sought to bridge the gap in Unionist thinking whereby they wish to return to the Stormont days of the Protestant ascendency and also insist that they are an integral part of the United Kingdom. They remind me of Marie Antionette who, being apprised of the fact that the peasants had no bread, suggested they might try brioche. With the utmost respect to the right hon. Member for South Down, the general Unionist proposition is one of having both bread and brioche at the same time, that is to say — to borrow a phrase that has been used tonight — having administrative devolution and total integration at the same time, or, in my words, it means wishing to be treated as a colony and as a part of the United Kingdom.

The right hon. Member for South Down has taken the view that in order better to preserve the Protestant ascendency there should be full integration of Northern Ireland with Great Britain. He wishes to take a series of steps forward so that that aspect of Northern Irish rule can be continued while at the same time there can be integrity of Northern Ireland with Great Britain. Tonight we heard the proposals of the hon. Member for Eastbourne who was seeking to put forward solutions which would harmonise that idea of integration at the same time as the idea of devolution.

The right hon. Member for South Down has protested in the past at the way in which we have handled our Northern Irish legislation. That has come up on a number of occasions. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), in private meetings last year with the leadership of the Unionists, proposed that we should move towards altering the treatment of this legislation. Those discussions were an early victim of the Anglo-Irish agreement because they did not get very far.

There is some seduction in the view of the right hon. Member for South Down because, for as long as Northern Ireland remains a part of the United Kingdom—it has remained so since 1921 notwithstanding the multitude of aspirations for Irish unity—for as long as there is direct rule from Westminster, as there is for Wales and Scotland and England, why should the legislation affecting Northern Ireland be treated any differently? Why should there not be the appropriate Northern Ireland Standing Committee or Select Committee to analyse legislation or issues affecting Northern Ireland so that they can be debated before they come to the Floor of the House? That is a matter of logic. I believe that to proceed to some kind of variation on how we do business here would be welcome to hon. Members. The Secretary of State put that forward as a positive suggestion in his statement to the House on June 12.

Unfortunately for the right hon. Member for South Down, his long-held aspirations towards integration suffered a cruel blow when the Government whom he has long supported signed, without his advice or approbation, the Anglo-Irish agreement. No amount of invective which was hurled across the Floor of the House towards the Prime Minister has matched the depth of his disappointment on this subject.

I have outlined the dilemma which I see faces the Unionist parties in Northern Ireland as they face the dissolution of their Assembly and the continuance of direct rule. At the end of the day, we must say that they must resolve those dilemmas for themselves. The role which they believe they should take is a matter for them. It is a road which must be democratic and constitutional. If I may borrow a phrase from President Reagan, they can run from the Anglo-Irish agreement, but they cannot hide from its consequences, nor, may I add, from the opportunities which the Anglo-Irish agreement offers them. We must all hope that the time is not far off when Unionist Members will again grace the proceedings of the House, that the offer of discussions with the Prime Minister is taken up, and when the Unionists understand that if there is a place for a minority community in Northern Ireland, with its religion, its culture and its nationalist aspiration, there is equally a place for a majority community which has shared with us not only a common culture and heritage, but a common bond in adversity in decades gone by.

The Opposition have no more intention of turning their back on that majority than have the Government. In the circumstances, the Opposition see no alternative but to support the order tonight and the continuance of direct rule until such time as there can be devolution in the interests of the minority and majority communities in Northern Ireland, whatever their ultimate aspiration may be.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I commend to the House both the orders that we have debated this evening. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) described what was happening today as a farewell party. My right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) drew an analogy with certain people in California who put dead bodies on ice. I regard it rather as the sort of farewell that one gives to someone who may need to leave for a period of rest and recuperation before returning to full health.

I reiterate the belief, which was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham), that it is devolved government, rather than the route which has come to be called integration, which provides the only solution and way forward for the government of Northern Ireland.

I echo the tribute that the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West paid to the Speaker, the Clerk, the staff and others who strove so mightily to make the Northern Ireland Assembly a success. Members of the Assembly are having their final debate now, and I echo the tribute paid by the right hon. and learned Gentleman to those who played a constructive role throughout its life.

I shall return later to discuss in more detail some aspects of the Anglo-Irish agreement and especially its benefits. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was at pains to say that in presenting the Anglo-Irish agreement and in arguing for it we should make it clear that it is not just security and cross-border security co-operation that should matter. Of course, I agree with that. There are economic, political, and cultural matters that can also benefit from the discussion that takes place in the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference and in sub-groups which work between meetings of the conference.

The communiqué of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference which was placed in the Library of the House following the meeting on 11 March listed well over 50 examples of cross-border co-operation in a variety of areas: education, tourism, fisheries, training, water resources and drainage. My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West will be pleased to hear that horse breeding is another example of cross-border co-operation. The range is impressive. I commend to those who are interested those examples of cross-border co-operation. Most of them pre-dated the Anglo-Irish agreement, but they can benefit from the existence of the agreement.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said that my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) posed the wrong question to the Assembly when it was established. I shall paraphrase for the sake of brevity what the right hon. Member for South Down said. He said that the right hon. Member for Waveney had asked the Assembly to reconcile the irreconcilable in the work that it was undertaking. I believe that the purpose of my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney in establishing the Assembly in 1982 was to determine whether sufficient common ground existed for the differences, which in constitutional matters are fundamental, to be put aside while elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland could co-operate to share discussion and ultimately decision-making on matters that affected the day-to-day lives of people living in Northern Ireland.

I am sad that an Assembly which I believe suffered from the outset from the understandable but, I still maintain, mistaken decision of the SDLP Members not to take their seats, and which has ended because of the refusal of the remaining Unionist Members to carry out the functions that Parliament has laid upon it should have come to an end. I regret it, but I believe that it will be but a temporary absence. I repeat my assertion that I believe that devolved government is the way forward for Northern Ireland.

I say to the right hon. Member for South Down—he took it from the physical reaction of my right hon. Friend but I repeat it now — that of course it is the Government's intention to ensure that courteous and proper treatment is accorded to those who have been Members of the Assembly and will cease to be so when the order which we are debating is finally signed. The Clerk is writing to Members of the Assembly to set out the arrangements which will be in hand for them to remove their equipment and belongings from the precincts of the Assembly.

The Government and the House are entitled to reciprocity in this matter. The behaviour that led Members of the Assembly to invade a part of the building that did not belong to them, with the result that they had to be removed by the Royal Ulster Constabulary, is not acceptable. I hope that we can look to those Members of the Assembly to behave with responsibility and courtesy. In return, we shall show it to them.

The right hon. Member for South Down made great play of the origins of the role of government in Northern Ireland. Historically, his analysis was totally correct. But he takes a huge leap forward when he says that, because the genesis of the concept of the role of government for Northern Ireland was based upon the aim of bringing about a united Ireland, that is why we now have devolved government in Northern Ireland, and that successive Governments have come to that idea simply to see the distinctive needs of Northern Ireland, and have established local arrangements so as to meet those needs. I shall return in more detail to the arguments about integration later in my speech.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends raised what they called the Irish dimension — in effect, the Anglo-Irish agreement. This is not the time or the place to go into detail about that agreement or why I maintain it is of immense importance to the future in Northern Ireland. I should like to make one thing clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison). He said that it would be better if these discussions could take place within the context of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council rather than the conference. I want to make it clear that the conference operates within the framework of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council. Because it is charged with the work of dealing with north-south matters, it is obviously appropriate, as envisaged in the Anglo-Irish agreement, that it should be Northern Ireland Office Ministers who should be concerned with the work of the conference. But it is working within the framework of the Intergovernmental Council.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: The difference is that the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference is the centre of an unequal treaty whereas the Anglo-Irish Intergovenmental Council is an organisation where Ministers from two sovereign states can meet on completely equal, reciprocal terms.

Mr. Scott: I shall come to that point because it was suggested that in some way the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental agreement had caused some sort of inequality. The proposition that was put before the House was that the Irish Ministers were in a position to put forward views and proposals on behalf of the Nationalist community while my right hon. Friend would have to take account of the interests of all the citizens in both communities in Northern Ireland and somehow there was some inequality in this arrangement. There is, but only for so long as the representatives of the Unionist community in Northern Ireland decline to come forward and use this House and the Assembly and all the other avenues that they have for contacting Northern Ireland Office Ministers in Northern Ireland. Ultimately all that the Irish Ministers can do within the context of the conference is to put forward views and proposals. The decision-making process remains absolutely with my right hon. Friend. Nothing in the Anglo-Irish agreement affects that fundamental constitutional position.

I was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West—and the point was also alluded to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion—about the benefits of the agreement. I can assure the House that benefits are beginning to flow, not least in the area of cross-border security co-operation. Extra resources have been moved by the Garda Siochana to the border areas. But in a sense it is not just the numbers but the nature of cross-border security co-operation that will be important in the development of work in that area.

We have already had the first fruits of the work of co-operation between the RUC and the Garda Siochana and those will be the building blocks upon which, in time, we shall erect a strategy throughout the island of Ireland, agreed and operated by the two police forces, which will deny the terrorist the explosives, guns, money and free movement of men that he needs to carry out his work.

Already, important work at policy and practical levels on fugitive offenders is being carried forward. The switch in the January elections towards constitutional nationalism and away for support for Sinn Fein is another important benefit that has already flowed from the existence of the Anglo-Irish agreement. However, the fruits that we have seen are but a start in the work that will eventually flow from the agreement.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I simply want to ask my hon. Friend whether he had any news of the date of ratification by the Republic of Ireland of the convention on the suppression of terrorism.

Mr. Scott: No. As was made clear when the Justice Minister of the Republic signed the convention on the suppression of terrorism, it will need legislation. It is envisaged that that will be introduced in the autumn of this year. I think that that has been clearly understood. However, I am by no means an expert on the Irish legislative processes, so I cannot say how long it will take to go through the Oireachtas.

I echo the point made by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) that it would be wrong—indeed, it would be impossible—for the House or the Government to impose some sort of solution for the political future of Northern Ireland. That must spring from the people of Northern Ireland. The Assembly was an attempt to provide the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland with a framework in which they could create that way forward. That must still be the principle on which we work. Only widespread agreement involving the elected representatives of both traditions can possibly provide the framework within which that progress can take place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), with his customary, impressive forensic skills, presented a formidable but flawed case to the House this afternoon. The 1979 manifesto of the Conservative party said:

"In the absence of devolved government,"—

I emphasise those words—

"we will seek to establish one or more elected regional councils with a wide range of power over local services."

I re-emphasise the words

"In the absence of devolved government".

There is no room for devolved government and a regional council. Even Macrory said that there was room for only three tiers of government in Northern Ireland—district councils, Stormont and Parliament. If my hon. Friend is urging us to accept a regional council, he clearly envisages the end of the search for devolved government and the Government are not convinced of the validity of that argument. But he made it clear this afternoon that he did not envisage any such council being elected by proportional representation. Does he—he would have to address this—envisage such a council being run on majority rule lines? If that were his proposal, I can see not the slightest chance of the House passing legislation to that end, nor of the widespread acceptance in both communities in Northern Ireland which would be essential for any progress on that front.

Mr. Gow: The words which my hon. Friend and I quoted are, not surprisingly, identical:

"In the absence of devolved government"

we shall seek to set up one or more regional councils. I emphasise the words

"In the absence of devolved government".

Does my hon. Friend agree that, since 4 May 1979, when the Conservative Government took office, there has been both an absence of devolved government and an absence of a regional council or councils? Is that not in breach of the very promise that was made in the 1979 manifesto?

Mr. Scott: The whole thrust of what I have put before the House so far is that we should retain the search for that devolved government because that provides the only sound way forward for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Murphy: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier that there will be consultations on these important matters without preconditions, he is in danger of creating those very preconditions?

Mr. Scott: With respect, I am going on to deal with some of the difficulties that those who advance some form of integration face in carrying their arguments through. But, no, the talks may be about amendments to the present arrangements for handling, for instance, legislative matters, but still against the context of the Government's commitment to a search for devolved government.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out, in his opening speech, the differences between Great Britain and Northern Ireland which justify a distinctive approach to the political arrangements that are made for the Province. Ever since the creation of Northern Ireland some 65 years ago, it has had different arrangements from those which have obtained on this side of the water. Of course, that is not to say that no change should take place if arguments could be sufficiently right or convincing to carry the day. But the Government are not convinced by those arguments.

Today, three propositions have been put before us—that there should be changes in the legislative arrangements, aiming, where possible, to legislate for Northern Ireland by Bill rather than by Order in Council; that we should abandon the aim of devolved government for Northern Ireland; and that we should have an increase in the powers of local government.

I do not think that any hon. Member will need convincing of the extra strains that we would put upon the timetable of the House of Commons were we to say that we should legislate only by Bill for Northern Ireland. A Grand Committee or a Select Committee, which have been referred to, would give rise to difficulties of membership and of balance within those Committees. I am aware, having served as a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office for nearly five years now, of the resentment—I do not think that is too strong a word—that exists about the present legislative arrangements in the House of Commons. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has specifically offered to talk to representatives of the Unionist party and others about those arrangements. It is up to them to put forward specific proposals which could be discussed with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State about alternative arrangements which would better suit the needs of Northern Ireland legislation within the House.

I shall not make great play of the administrative upheaval which would be created by some of the arrangements suggested this afternoon. But if we were to abandon the search for devolved government and go down the integrationist route, the Ulster Unionist party would be far from unanimous in changing towards that course. The Democratic Unionist party, the Alliance party and the Social Democratic and Labour party would be completely hostile to any such change. Indeed, they have all made clear their hostility to it. Certainly there would be no chance of getting any widespread acceptance of the principles behind an integrationist approach.

Integration, in effect, would mean permanent direct rule for Northern Ireland — all the disadvantages of having a Secretary of State and other British Ministers ruling the Province, with no prospect of a body in Northern Ireland that could advise, disagree, argue, and persuade British Ministers on necessary changes in order to make that legislation reflect the needs of the local community in Northern Ireland.

Since 1982, I have seen clearly how effective the Assembly has been in monitoring the work of the Northern Ireland Departments, and how willing British Ministers in Northern Ireland have been to make changes in the legislation so as to make it more amenable to the needs of Northern Ireland.

We see an end to the Assembly today. We have to find a new way forward for Northern Ireland. That can happen only if the representatives of the Unionist parties in Northern Ireland are prepared to talk to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about their genuine concerns. The Anglo-Irish agreement is an international treaty and it is not going to be put aside or suspended. But surely all elected representatives from Northern Ireland, Unionist and Nationalist, have a duty to engage in talks. The sooner they take place, the better.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 12th June, be approved.

Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Extension)

Ordered,

That the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 4th June, be approved.—[Mr. Tom King.]

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions)

8 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 2) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 22nd May, be approved.

I welcome this opportunity to restate the Government's policy on security in Northern Ireland and to explain why the Government feel it necessary to propose the continuation of the temporary provisions in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act.

I shall begin with a brief review of security since the last renewal debate. So far this year, 13 members of the security forces and 14 civilians have died as a result of the security situation in the Province. I make no secret of the fact that the threat from Republican terrorism, mainly the Provisional IRA, remains high. It takes different forms, including shooting attacks on the security forces, the use of home-made explosives, and developments in mortar attacks against security force bases. To counter that threat the security forces are maintaining the most intensive rate of operations since 1981.

Against that background, the House will no doubt share my dismay and understand the frustration of the security forces when public disorder and intimidation, associated with so-called Loyalist protests against the Anglo-Irish agreement, divert vital police resources from the crucial task of dealing with terrorism. Disgraceful and cowardly attacks on off-duty policemen and women, and their homes and families, have made the job of the Royal Ulster Constabulary even more dangerous and difficult than usual.

Against that background, I know that the whole House will join me in praising the courage, impartiality and steadfastness of the RUC. The professional attitude that marks the RUC is a constant reassurance to all law-abiding people in the Province. I must also pay tribute, as I know the RUC would wish me to do, to the unstinting support provided to it by the Armed Forces. Significant extra military resources have been deployed recently in the Province to assist the RUC, to protect police stations and to mount additional patrols, while the men and women of the Ulster Defence Regiment continue to bear the brunt of front-line support for the RUC over much of the Province.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Is the right hon. Gentleman minded to act on the recommendation of Sir John Hermon, that the decision to allow a march or to re-route one and soon, should be taken out of the hands of the police and given to an independent body? If he made such a suggestion, it would make life easier for the police —and it is profoundly difficult at the moment—and would find support in various quarters of the House.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his interest in that point. However, I hope that he will forgive me if I comment later on marches and so on.

I would not wish my tribute to the security forces and the brave and courageous task that they discharge in the Province to exclude my tribute to the dedication with which members of the prison service approach their duties. Those duties are, of course, made that much more difficult by the nature of the prison population in Northern Ireland and, sadly, by the attacks that they too have suffered at the hands of so-called Loyalists.

The threat that terrorism presents to society in today's world demands an international response. Work on cross-border security, to which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State referred earlier, has certainly made an encouraging start following the Anglo-Irish agreement. There have also been developments since the last renewal debate. I refer, for example, to the important signature of the Government of the Republic of Ireland to the European convention on the suppression of terrorism. We look forward to the presentation of legislation in the Dail, and hope that it will make good progress.

The House will also be aware of the substantial majority in the Senate Committee which examined the extradition treaty between the United States and this country. We obviously hope that there will now be speedy progress through the Senate. Constant vigilance, surveillance and intelligence are an essential part of the fight against terrorism, which often has an international dimension, if not being positively sponsored by other unfriendly nations. In that respect, the House will realise the commitment and dedication that is represented by the successful prosecution of the bombers involved in the outrage at the Grand hotel, Brighton. Hon. Members will also have read of those found guilty of the appalling outrage at the Droppin' Well Inn in Ballykelly.

Moreover, in recent months there have been substantial arms finds in Roscommon, just over the border in County Sligo. There have also been successes in Amsterdam, Boston, and most recently in Le Havre. Such successes are not accidental but the result of determined co-operation and of a growing sense of international commitment to working together to root out the evil of terrorism that threatens the democracies of the western world. We are committed to the fight against terrorism by apprehending supplies of arms and by ensuring that there are effective extradition arrangements, so that those who should stand charged of some of the most grievous crimes against their fellow citizens can be brought back to face trial. We must ensure that there is no safe haven to which terrorists can easily flee.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): No one could deny the courage and determination to fight terrorism that have been displayed so well by members of the RUC. However, does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most unfriendly nations is that run by the madman Gaddafi? He has announced that he will send £1·3 million to support the IRA. Does that not mean that there will have to be even more control and observation along the borders so that we can fight terrorism that is sponsored by a country that has no respect for democracy?

Mr. King: I have already mentioned the threat posed by state-sponsored terrorism. If the latest intelligence is correct, the Libyan Government are determined to return again to the path that there is clear evidence to show they were on before. That is most unwelcome. The House will have noted and appreciated the extremely prompt response of Mr. Peter Barry, the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic, who made it clear that that was totally unacceptable. He gave instructions that representations were to be made immediately to the Libyan Government, with whom the Irish Government still have, I believe, diplomatic relations, in order to make it clear that such activity would be quite unacceptable whether north or south of the border. Everything that he said is entirely in line with our thinking on the subject.

That remark emphasised once again a point which must be increasingly understood, that one of the tragedies of the present position—the list of deaths that I have just read out—is that these murders are being committed with less and less point. I have heard the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) stress that these murders are pointless and that there is no longer any objective to be obtained through such terrorism. That is not the way that aspirations will be achieved.

The increasing political and human irrelevance of the IRA and other terrorist organisations proves that they no longer have a moral basis for their activities—not that they ever had one. That clearly emphasises that the terrorists recognise that they cannot persuade or command genuine support in a democratic society. Therefore, terrorism is their worst and last refuge.

It is significant, and many hon. Members will have noticed, that one of the features of recent murders is that three of the victims were Catholics, members of the minority community. Nothing can confirm more clearly that a permanent tyranny of terror is now all that the IRA can offer to people north or south of the border in Ireland.

Our commitment is to fight and to defeat the evil of terrorism. That must be done on a basis that our security policy is founded on the belief that the fight against terrorism is based on a strict observance of the law and on bringing terrorists to justice before the courts. In the face of the problems, difficulties and criticisms that they face about the system and the administration of justice that operates in a society where terrorism exists and where there is intimidation, whether that be of juries or witnesses, I would like to pay tribute to the great courage and commitment of the Lord Chief Justice and his colleagues in the Northern Ireland judiciary for the brave way in which they still discharge justice in the most difficult circumstances in the United Kingdom.

I would like to consider in that spirit the emergency legislation under which the judiciary operates in Northern Ireland. I recognise, as everyone recognises, that these are exceptional provisions to meet exceptional circumstances. We have sought to establish the minimum adjustments to ordinary law to enable the security forces and the judicial system to cope with the problems of terrorism.

When the Emergency Provisions Act as a whole is looked at in this light, I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members will agree that Parliament's duty is to ensure that the derogations from the normal legal processes are as limited as possible and that any such derogation is fully justified. I and my predecessors and my ministerial colleagues have given very considerable and careful thought to the issues which arise. We have studied and discussed Sir George Baker's recommendations for amending the Act. We have also given careful consideration to the views of individuals and organisations — notably the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights—who have commented on Sir George Baker's recommendations. The Government have thus accepted that there is scope for amending the Act and we will be introducing legislation for this purpose as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits, and certainly within the life of this Parliament.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I believe that the Secretary of State, in seeking our trust in this undertaking, is going a little far, for we may not be here in this Session next spring. Would he go further and say that he will introduce the legislation in the next parliamentary Session?

Mr. King: I am a stickler for parliamentary conventions and will not anticipate any Queen's Speech. I certainly will not anticipate the date of the next general election. We understand and believe in the importance of the legislation and I hope that it will be possible to reflect the spirit of what the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) has said, and the target time which he had in mind.

During the debate on a continuance order on 25 June 1985, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd) set out in general terms the Government's main proposals for amending the Act, arising from Sir George Baker's recommendations. These proposals included an increase in the Attorney-General's discretion to certify cases out of the scheduled mode of trial — which has now been achieved by an amendment order which came into effect in January this year; the repeal of the police power in section 11 of the Act, which duplicates the arrest power in section 12 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act; recasting section 2(2) so that the onus in bail applications will be on the prosecution, and widening section 2(5) to include members of the RUC and RUC Reserve; and making the temporary provisions of the Act renewable annually by Parliament and subject to a maximum life of five years without re-enactment.

My right hon. Friend also said that he was considering Sir George's recommendation that magistrates should be able to remand persons accused of scheduled offences in custody for up to 28 days without consent so as to avoid wasteful and meaningless remand hearings. I can now say that I propose to implement this recommendation. I also propose that certain powers in the Act—the powers of entry and search in section 11(2), the power of arrest without warrant in sections 13 and 14, and the powers of entry and search in section 15(2) and (3)—should be exercised only on the basis of "reasonable suspicion". I should like to take this opportunity to describe in general terms some additional proposals which the Government intend to incorporate in that amending legislation.

We intend to propose provisions governing the rights while in custody of suspects arrested under the emergency legislation to have someone informed of their arrest and to have access to a solicitor. These provisions would effectively replicate for Northern Ireland the provisions of sections 56 and 58 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 as they apply to persons arrested under the terrorism provisions.

We also intend to take the opportunity to introduce measures intended to inhibit the exploitation by paramilitary organisations of the private security industry in Northern Ireland. It is a matter of deep concern to me that members of paramilitary organisations should be able to masquerade as private security companies while engaging in what is little more than a glorified extortion racket. This concern has also been voiced by many public representatives in Northern Ireland and by the Northern Ireland Assembly. We propose a relatively simple scheme in which private security companies would be required to seek a certificate from the Secretary of State, and such a certificate could be denied if the Secretary of State were satisfied that the granting of a certificate would further the aims of a paramilitary organisation, whether directly or indirectly.

It is obvious to all observers that the border with the Irish Republic plays a large part in the current phase of Republican terrorist activities. It is against that background that my earlier reference to the importance of the work of the Anglo-Irish agreement for improving cross-border security co-operation is so valuable. I know that some of my hon. Friends have expressed anxiety and impatience for early results. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), who is so familiar with police matters, knows the time, preparation and depth of work involved in trying to achieve real improvements and the basis for effective co-operation that is necessary.

I can report to the House that the most encouraging item at the last Anglo-Irish conference held on Tuesday was the report received from the Chief Constable and the deputy commissioner of the Garda on the measures agreed to improve arrangements for the exchange of information and to develop liaison structures. A significant amount of work has been done and more will be carried out shortly. That offers the best prospect that there has ever been for close co-operation between the two police forces, faced as they are with the challenge and threat of terrorism.

Before I conclude my remarks on the order, I should like to add something, as I said I would, on the thorny issue of parades and marches in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland has a long tradition of marching to commemorate various historical events. Most of those processions are colourful and enjoyable occasions, but regrettably some have become strident and triumphalist in tone and purpose and a focus for sectarianism. The Public Order Bill currently before Parliament addresses the issue of how public processions should be controlled in England and Wales, and the House has shown during the debates on the Bill that it supports the right of any person or group of persons to hold a public procession so long as it does not unreasonably interfere with the lives of people living and working in the area, or involve the prospect of serious public disorder.

My hope is that a similar attitude will prevail in Northern Ireland. How can it benefit anyone to march through an area where the inhabitants do not support the views being expressed by the marchers, and where the only result is to exacerbate tension in the area? This is a straightforward issue, and my views on the subject arise from my concern about the effect of such marches on inter-community relations within Northern Ireland. It is an issue on which the Chief Constable called for common sense and tolerance from both sides of the community in successive annual reports long before the Anglo-Irish agreement was signed.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The Secretary of State said that he hopes that the same attitude will prevail in Northern Ireland. Surely he should be telling us that he hopes that the same legislation will prevail in Northern Ireland. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it is in the mind of the Government to ensure that legislation to deal with that matter is introduced, not just that he hopes that the attitude will prevail?

Mr. King: I have already told the House that we are waiting for the Public Order Bill to complete its passage through the House before we consider its implications for Northern Ireland. In the light of the Bill and any amendments that are made in either House, we shall consider the ways in which we might apply such legislation in Northern Ireland.

Under the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, the control of public processions is a matter for the police. I want to make that point absolutely clear. It is a police responsibility, and not mine, to decide whether to impose conditions on the organisers of a parade. It is true that I have a reserve power to prohibit processions and public meetings, but I want to make it absolutely clear that that power has invariably been exercised on the basis of police advice. Let me make it clear that that will continue to be my position. I would not intend to exercise that power save only on the advice of the police, on the proper law and order grounds.

The House will be aware that this year there have been hundreds of parades, and most have gone off entirely peacefully. Many hundreds more parades will take place in the next few months. I do not know how many — the House will realise that there are more than 2,000 marches and parades every year in Northern Ireland. That is a massive undertaking, with a massive responsibility and work commitment for the RUC. If the organisers, in discussion with the RUC, can act responsibly and choose routes that are not provocative, it will be possible for the marches to take place much more peacefully, and in a way that creates the maximum enjoyment for those involved, without interfering with the daily lives of those who might not share the marchers' views or beliefs.

I am sure that the whole House will join me in sincerely encouraging people in Northern Ireland who are in any position of responsibility — parade organisers or members of the various orders — to consider carefully before finalising their proposals this summer, and to take account of the impact that their marches could have on inter-community relations.

I respond to the question asked by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). The Chief Constable himself has put forward proposals in his most recent annual report on the way in which those marches and the issues raised by them might be dealt with in the years ahead. That proposal can be considered and discussed. It is not relevant for this marching season. This season will take place under the rules that are already well established, whereby the Chief Constable has the responsibility.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): With regard to the proposal that has been attributed to the Chief Constable, will my right hon. Friend make sure before he carries it far that he discusses it with the other police staff associations, particularly the Association of Chief Police Officers on this side of the water, which he may well find takes a different view?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend said "attributed", but the proposal is in the Chief Constable's annual report. As far as I am aware, it has not been taken further at this stage. I am aware that there are some concerns about that, and that there are some who feel that it would be a bold gentleman who took on that responsibility. In Northern Ireland, one can see what a responsibility it might prove to be. I shall simply note what my hon. Friend says. As far as I am aware, the proposal has not been taken further, and it is unlikely that it will be until after the marching season, when further lessons may be learned and further views formed as to whether it is worth pursuing. If it is, it should involve consultation with the various associations, as my hon. Friend suggested.

Mr. Soley: We recognise that the responsibility cannot be given to local authorities in Northern Ireland. No one is suggesting that. The principle is to take the police out of the problem of having to decide the route or conditions between competing political parties, which is often what it is about. If the police are taken out of that, and that responsibility is given to the independent bodies, as Sir John suggested, the duty of the police is more clearly to enforce the law. That is easier to do if they are not part of the discussion beforehand on whether the route is correct, and so on. I recognise that there are difficulties, but the police need to be taken out of the vice between competing groups.

Mr. King: The decisions on the suitability of routes are taken not on political grounds, but entirely on grounds of law and order, and the risk of disorder. I shall not go further because we see some real problems with the proposal, and this is not the moment to discuss it. After the marching season, and if it is wished to pursue the proposal further, there will be an opportunity for consideration to be given to it.

I hope that what I have said has demonstrated the concern that we have, while recognising the need to retain the emergency legislation that applies to Northern Ireland, to keep it under continual review. I certainly look to the opportunity to place the proposals that I will make before the House in legislative form. I should be interested in any thinking and views that right hon. and hon. Members and outside organisations may have on my comments. I include in that the political parties in Northern Ireland.

I have therefore conceded that the Government believe that the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 should be amended in a number of respects, but the question before us tonight is whether the temporary provisions of the Act should continue in force. For the reasons that I gave, regarding the security situation, the background against which the security forces and the Government have to operate, and the potential threat of terrorist violence that continues to hang over the people of Northern Ireland, I believe that it is essential that the order is renewed. I commend it to the House.

8.28 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The Secretary of State has one advantage over me today. According to my calculations, this is the sixth debate in which I have taken part devoted to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978. In each one, I have said the same thing. I make no apologies for that. I imagine that I would be open to criticism if I had not. We have all on occasion recognised that we may have been mistaken, but normally consistency is considered to be a virtue, and on this subject our views have not changed. So I have said the same thing. There comes a time when one exhausts the various ways of saying the same thing. There are hon. Members on the Government Benches who have just as consistently disagreed with us, and that is their right. There are also those who have made no effort to understand what we on this side of the House have been saying. They have never directed their minds to the issues we have raised. They have sought to refute us by reciting facts, obvious to everyone, as though we had overlooked them. They have invented opinions which we do not hold, and they have invented proposals which we have never made. As I cannot leave our arguments to be caricatured by those who do not understand them, if they were minded to do so, I fear that, at the risk of being tiresome, I will have to repeat what I have said so often. I will try to do so briefly as this is a short debate, and I will confine what I have to say to the specific issue which the House is deciding tonight.

This debate is not about who cares the most for law and order. We yield to no one in this House in our condemnation of lawlessness. Those who suffer most when the law ceases to be respected are those who are most vulnerable — the elderly, those on low incomes, those who are condemned to live in shadowed thresholds, dark with fears. We need no lessons on the evil which may be inflicted by human wickedness. We have no illusions about how innocent people can suffer from indiscriminate violence — in whatever cause — whether it is carried out on the instructions of a commandant, or a godfather, or the Libyan Government, or ordered by an American President. I hope we will be spared a lecture about the evils of terrorism, because anyone who pretends that that is what this debate is about is either incapable of understanding the issues or suffers from the oblivion of the wilfully deaf.

Nor are we oblivious of the difficult and dangerous tasks which we call upon the police and the law enforcement bodies to undertake. On other occasions we have paid tribute to them for the way in which they carry out their unenviable job. But they will tell us that their task does not become easier if we take away the normal guidelines within which they are expected to operate. We can judge lapses with some sympathy and understanding, but that is not the same as saying that anything goes. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), I was pleased to see the comments of Sir John Hermon. The police are protected if they are responsible to an authority which is fair and is manifestly seen to be fair——

Sir Eldon Griffiths: That does not make sense.

Mr. Archer: Before we heard that explosion, I had intended to say that I recognise that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) has a point. It does raise questions for debate, but this is not the occasion to debate them.

We on the Opposition Benches have two anxieties, and I am aware that they are shared by some hon. Members on the Government Benches whose minds are not completely closed.

First, we are aware of how provisions which were introduced in an emergency can become so entrenched in our habits of thinking that we come to regard them as normal. Not only do we cease to ask whether they can lead to unfairness, but we cease to ask ourselves whether they serve their original purpose, or whether they make any contribution to reducing crime. A conviction becomes a success, irrespective of whether we have convicted the right person.

In Northern Ireland a whole generation of lawyers, police and politicians have grown up with the 1973 Act and its successors. They have spent their professional lives knowing nothing else. As one provision succeeds another and standards are gradually eroded, those who set out to destroy our way of life can take comfort because they will have succeeded. If we in this House cease to scrutinise each provision at least twice a year, we shall have fallen from the standards set by those who originally drafted the legislation. I am grateful to the Secretary of State for having said that that is a function which the House must faithfully discharge.

I offer one example of how a power on the statute book encourages law enforcement authorities to act in ways which are both oppressive and pointless and which, on reflection, the authorities would not wish to do. On 22 October 1980 a young lady, Miss Ann Walsh, was arrested in her home by members of the armed forces. She was taken to the police station in a Saracen armoured car in full view of the neighbours. She was subjected to the humiliation of being searched and photographed. She was detained for about two hours and then released without any apology then or subsequently.

Ann Walsh was a school teacher and was described later by the Lord Chief Justice as "quiet, unassuming and of at least average sensibility."

Neither she nor any member of her family had ever been in trouble. It later transpired that someone had suggested that she had been associating with a member of an illegal organisation. That was untrue. It was a piece of gossip, and no one has ever discovered how it arose. But even if it had been true it would not have justified her arrest. Asked later in legal proceedings of what offence she was suspected, the person who arrested her replied

"That's what we wanted to find out."

The military authorities apparently thought they were entitled to arrest Ann Walsh under the emergency provisions Act in the hope that they might find out some reason for their suspicions. They could only have thought that because section 11 of the Act has not been repealed. That section was clearly intended to be used only as a preliminary to detention under section 12. No one has been detained under section 12 for years. So far as I am aware, and certainly so far as I hope, there is no proposal to activate section 12 again. Yet sections 11 and 12 remain on the statute book.

There are other perfectly adequate powers of arrest, as Sir George Baker pointed out. The Lord Chief Justice had forthright criticisms to make of the authorities, and in the event he awarded Miss Walsh substantial damages. I do not suggest that the military authorities acted otherwise than in the interests of law and order. I think they got carried away, and I mention the case not by way of criticism of the military authorities, but because what happened was because of the existence of an unnecessary provision. If the authorities are invited to use unnecessary powers, there will be occasions when they exceed even the powers given to them.

There are provisions in this legislation which, as the right hon. Gentleman recognised fairly, are agreed to be no longer justified. Sir George Baker listed some of them. We are not persuaded that he went far enough, but that is an argument for another occasion. Sir George believed that some of the provisions and some of the powers were unnecessary and unfair, and even counter productive. He reported in March 1984 and, until now, his recommendations have been gathering dust on the shelves. We were pleased to hear what the right hon. Gentleman said tonight —and I am grateful for his invitation for our comments.

He would not expect us to respond off the cuff—that would be silly. We will consider them. I hope we shall have an opportunity to debate them on another occasion. We do not believe, however, that this House would be doing its job if it simply rubber stamped the continuation of the present provisions.

Our second anxiety is that the strongest foundation for law and order, the strongest deterrent to lawlessness, is a conviction in the mind of the public that the law is manifestly fair and that those who enforce it go no further than is essential. The factor most likely to dissuade someone from lawlessness is the disapproval of his or her peer group—those among whom he moves and whose good opinion he values. If they can be persuaded that the law goes no further than is necessary, that it is fair between one group and another, that it protects those who are vulnerable, they will be more effective in dissuading potential law breakers than a whole army of policemen.

If the local communities in Northern Ireland can believe that the way to redress grievances is by constitutional politics and by the use of legal redress that freedom under the law is a reality, then the men of violence will be isolated and their recruiting ground will be denied them.

Nothing in Northern Ireland has given greater aid or comfort to the paramilitaries than the supergrass trials as they have come to be used. I shall not rehearse all the criticisms that we have made. It would afford us some comfort to learn that there will be no more supergrass trials, but I understand that that is not necessarily to be the case.

I know that accomplice evidence is admitted in other jurisdictions, including the courts of England and Wales, but its use in the Diplock context with a multiplicity of defendants, with long remands in custody before trial, and with inducements to lie, such as resettlement, immunity from prosecution and remission of sentence, is something different, and I believe that it would not have been tolerated by the authorities themselves a few years ago. They have become inured to falling standards.

I do not believe that this is something which can be left to the police, the prosecuting authorities or the courts. They can only administer the existing law. A legislative provision is needed to the effect that no one is to be convicted under the Diplock procedure on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. As I understand it, that is the intention of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). He will no doubt seek to speak in the debate, but I hope he will forgive me if I pre-empt him by asking what the Government's intentions are in relation to that Bill. Will the House be given time to debate it?

It is essential that the law enforcement agencies are scrupulous to remain within the law and that they are manifestly seen to be scrupulous. If under the stress of the moment a policeman or soldier makes a mistake, I hope that we shall always make allowances for the pressures of the circumstance. That is not the same as condoning illegalities or sweeping inquiries under a carpet.

There is widespread anxiety about the Stalker inquiry. I know nothing of the matters under investigation in relation to Mr. Stalker, and I make no comment about them, but part of the anxiety arises because the public has been told nothing. It would not be surprising if people asked why it was announced that Mr. Stalker was removed from the Northern Ireland inquiry before the allegations made against him appear to have been investigated.

Mr. Mallon: It is crucial that we know whether Mr. Stalker had completed his report, and what Mr. Sampson has been charged to investigate.

Mr. Archer: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman knows more about the matter than I do. I am only asking a neutral question: would it not have been wiser to suspend the inquiry until the allegations had been investigated? And when the Minister replies, perhaps he can tell the House how much of the inquiry was completed under Mr. Stalker's direction, how much remained to be carried out, and when he will be in a position to make a further announcement.

This debate is brief and I promised that I would not repeat what I have already said in five previous debates. We of the Opposition believe that hysteria, resentment and grievances are the enemies of law enforcement. We believe that the most effective foundation of law enforcement is the confidence of the public, and that legislation should be designed to reinforce that confidence. That is why we shall divide the House tonight.

8.42 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I appreciate the position of the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), but I have seldom heard a speech which less justified the decision announced at the end. He made a civilised, intelligent, sensitive speech, not agreeing wholly with but welcoming a good deal of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said. It certainly lived up to the issues before us and to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's knowledge of them. But suddenly, at the end, as if he were chucking a stone into a pond, he said:

"That is why we shall divide the House."

There may be good reasons for that and we may hear them, but we certainly did not hear them from him. Perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) will repair the omission.

On Monday the House debated a subject for which we have no direct responsibility and over which we have little power: South Africa. The House was packed, the media were agog and the BBC recorded the proceedings live. Today we are debating an important part of the United Kingdom, for the citizens of which this House has absolute sovereign responsibility. It is an area where a large number of our fellow citizens have been killed and many live in peril. It is a province to which we provide more subsidy per head than any other part of Britain and where our investments dwarf those in South Africa. Yet today the House is virtually empty. I find that odd, but on reflection I suspect that the House, not for the first time, is mirroring a change of great importance in our country, namely, that the British people are beginning to disengage psychologically from Northern Ireland. They are switching off, turning their backs on the Province.

There are many reasons for that. Nobody enjoys the sight of killings and murders or the scenes of hopelessness and helplessness which often afflict us when we look at Northern Ireland. Above all, no one can countenance the failure of constitutional device after constitutional device, the last of which was dissolved today, or the sight of Northern Ireland politicians squabbling with each other whatever is proposed. To that extent, the House is reflecting a profound public disillusionment which the politicians of Northern Ireland should take with the utmost seriousness.

I am a Unionist. I hope that the Union will prevail. But I perceive the main threat to the union today not as being the IRA or the Anglo-Irish agreement but the progressive disengagement of the British people on this side of the water from a quarrelsome Province. And my anxieties are reinforced—I hope I say this with complete fairness—by what I detect to be the evolving attitude of some Labour Members.

At the Labour conference some speakers wanted to turn their backs on Northern Ireland and walk away from it. Some Labour Members—I am not referring to any of those present—may say before the general election that the Labour manifesto should include some commitment to have one more go at a solution but if no agreement can be reached with the Republic over progress towards a united Ireland, then the Labour party should commit itself to getting out of Ulster completely. I do not know whether that will happen, but such voices can certainly be detected within the Labour movement.

The Labour party in government may also get into severe economic difficulties. I believe it will do. And I have been in the House long enough to know that drastic decisions are taken by Cabinets when they face economic crisis. Aden had to go because of prescription charges. It is possible that Labour may say, "We cannot afford to continue with Northern Ireland. We have other things to do with our money."

As a supporter of the Union, I am anxious about those matters. I raise them today because the message that needs to go out from the House to the politicians of Northern Ireland, especially those who are not present, is that their constant unwillingness to resolve differences, to find peace, to talk with British Ministers, to join in the political process—this abdication on the part of the representatives of Northern Ireland from the processes of our national life—is likely to accelerate the disengagement of the British people from Northern Ireland. We have a duty to give that warning to those in Northern Ireland whose friendship and loyalty I wish to preserve.

I turn to the subject of public order and terrorism, to which this order is specifically directed. I welcome the Secretary of State's decision that the order must be extended. I welcome it with regret because all of us regret the draconian powers of the emergency provisions. But in the present circumstances I do not think that the police and security services in Northern Ireland could possibly operate without them. They could not otherwise provide the protection for persons and property that our citizens are entitled to expect. So if this House were to remove the powers which provide that protection, we should be in dereliction of our duty. That is why I shall find it strange if the Opposition vote against the order.

Broadly speaking, my right hon. Friend is right to say that there has been some improvement in the terrorist situation. Four strong blows have been struck at international terrorists over recent weeks. First, the conviction of the Brighton bomber and his accomplices was a remarkable police achievement. The House ought to pay tribute to the forensic experts of the Metropolitan police and to many forces up and down the country who pursued patiently and diligently a very difficult quarry. We should also pay tribute to the co-operation between the police on this side of the water and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. Brighton was a severe blow to terrorism.

So, too, was the successful conviction—indeed, there was confession—of the murderers of 17 young people at the Droppin' Well pub in Ballykelly. The morning after that massacre I went to the ruins. Some of the bodies were still stacked up like dominoes. I saw a satin dance shoe belonging to one of the young girls. That brought it home to me. And as it happens, I heard over a radio that was switched into the BBC's "News at One" programme that back here in Westminster Mr. Kenneth Livingstone was entertaining that very day the representatives of Sinn Fein at County Hall. I must confess that I reacted strongly to that news in the ruins of the Droppin' Well pub. When I returned to London I took that slipper across the river, went into Mr. Liverstone's office, banged it on the desk and invited his people to hand the slipper to the Sinn Fein representatives.

I am proud of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and I am glad that they should have achieved the conviction of that group, including females as well as males, who blew up those young people at the Droppin' Well pub.

My right hon. Friend also mentioned the successes of the police and the security services in France, Holland and elsewhere in making a series of arrests—charges no doubt will follow—of gunrunners in Le Havre and elsewhere who have been involved in getting weapons—some of them sophisticated—to the IRA. That is a further great success. I believe that it reflects, more than anything else, the new collaboration that is emerging between the police and the security services of western Europe and North America.

For that—I hope that I put this objectively—the Libya raid must be thanked. Before the Libyan air strike, summit conferences had said many fine things about increasing collaboration on measures to counter terrorism. The foreign Ministers had met and the home Ministers had met and they had said the same. But my experience is that before Libya the words were strong but that the action was weak; since Libya, however, there has been far closer collaboration in the sharing of intelligence and in the working together of the police services and this has helped to bring about the convictions and arrests that we must now greet with satisfaction.

It is to also be welcomed that this increasing international co-operation is buttressed by the efforts of the Reagan Administration to ensure that the CIA and the FBI give us better support than we have ever had before. I think that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and my hon. Friend the Minister of State will confirm that. The United States has helped enormously.

Then, too, there is the Anglo-Irish agreement. This causes serious problems of conscience for many members of the RUC, to which I shall turn in a moment, but it must also be recognised that the agreement has put the stamp of political approval on the cross-border co-operation that for years had been developing between the two police forces. This has now been given a political momentum that is greatly welcomed by those who are the practitioners of security on both sides of the border.

I must mention another matter. It is a useful step forward that the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate has agreed, by a larger majority than some of us might have expected, to report out the extradition treaty. This does not go all the way. But it goes a large part of the way. It will, I believe, be helpful.

It is perfectly understandable, when one considers the traditions of the United States, that some Senators were reluctant to allow extradition without a court process. I recognise that Senator Eagleton and his colleagues need the consent of their courts to be incorporated in the arrangements before they would report out the Bill. But I have one question about this to ask my hon. Friend. Accepting, as I do, that the Senate's version is likely to be agreed to by the United States Congress as a whole, is he able to say whether he perceives that there could be difficulties with some of the United States jurisdictions when they look at the Diplock courts and consider whether a fair trial is available? The Americans are used to the jury system. It could be that in some federal appeal court jurisdictions the absence of a jury, because of Diplock, might be used as a reason for refusing extradition. This is an important matter. I do not ask my hon. Friend to give assurances that are beyond his ability. I just want to be certain that the matter has been looked at and discussed with the Federal authorities.

I make this further suggestion. It is not within the ability of any American court actually to determine on the ground whether the processes in Northern Ireland provide a fair trial. A court does not have a researcher who can be sent over here to check up, and we should resent it deeply if it did. I also suppose that the practice in this country, if there were any question as to whether or not a jurisdiction abroad were fair, would be that it would be up to our Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to provide a certificate to the court, saying that he was satisfied that there could be a fair trial in a particular country.

I ask my hon. Friend to consider making representations to the United States that, in the event of a United States court resisting extradition on the ground that the Diplock procedures did not provide for a jury, it should be sufficient for the United States Secretary of State to provide a certificate giving his assurance that he was satisfied beyond any question that the Diplock courts in Northern Ireland are fair. I put that proposal to my hon. Friend, because it needs to be considered.

I move from the general proposition that there is a measurable improvement on the security front to a warning that it would be madness to become complacent. As my right hon. Friend has very fairly said, murder, bombing, kidnapping and assassination are still parts of the arsenal of the IRA.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman has declared himself to be a Unionist. Does he maintain that these are the tools only of the IRA? Are they not the tools that are also used by paramilitaries on the Unionist side that he espouses?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It makes no difference from which side murder, assassination or kidnapping comes. I attributed those things to the IRA, but I condemn all those who do such things.

I should like to speak for one moment about the pressures and strains on the Royal Ulster Constabulary. I make no bones about it: for a force that has expanded rapidly from about 3,000 to 8,000 regulars, or to 10,000 if we include the immediate reserves, over some seven or eight years, the RUC has made remarkable progress. It is probably the most proficient counter-insurgency civil police force in the western world, and it deserves congratulations on its professional efficiency and on the dedication and courage of its members.

On Monday night the Secretary of State and I attended the annual conference of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. It was most agreeable to hear the tribute that the Secretary of State paid to the force. His words were sincere and greatly appreciated. Large numbers of RUC men are nevertheless going through a crisis of conscience. Some of them are bewildered; they do not quite know where they stand. One reason for this is that the RUC is overstretched. The force is being expected to do too much. The RUC in fact is a police force with four separate roles.

Its first role is to carry out all the ordinary police tasks. Crimes of disorder, traffic offences, drugs and corruption are growing all over the world; and coping with those things alone would be enough for the RUC. But, on top of that, it has other roles that are not carried out by our other police services. Thus its second role is to fight a terrorist offensive. The RUC is a counter-insurgency force and a large part of its time, probably 40 per cent. of its time in one way or another, is expended not on fighting conventional crime, but on counter-insurgency.

The Royal Ulster Constabulary's third role is as the guardian of an international frontier. That, too, is an armed role and a special one that the RUC and its predecessors have had since the setting up of the border. This task demands a great deal of a civilian police force; indeed, when one visits some of the border posts, one sees that the RUC is not really policing at all. In many cases its members are besieged in semi-fortresses, festooned with barbed wire. Its officers are often unable to go out to carry out the conventional tasks of serving warrants and apprehending criminals without the armed protection of the Army.

It is the RUC's fourth role that is the most difficult of all. Since the Anglo-Irish agreement, the RUC has been confronted by a major public order problem arising from the hostility of a very large number, probably a majority, of the people of Northern Ireland who are against that agreement. As a result of that perceived hostility, many members of the RUC have been faced with some impossible dilemmas.

There are professional dilemmas. How does one police against the wishes of the majority? How does one police without what we like to describe as consent? What is the position of a police officer when, as one of them put it to me, he is expected to "give them a tanning in the streets and drink with them in the evening?"

There are personal dilemmas too when police officers are expected to ban or stop marches and then go back and live within the community from which those marches traditionally have originated. Police officers who have grown up in one culture, lived among one group of people now find themselves spurned, despised and cold shouldered by their neighbours and friends. Inevitably, that has an impact on their working lives.

I have seen nothing worse nor more unforgivable in Northern Ireland than the attacks by so-called Loyalists on members of the police force. We have all seen and condemned them, but I shall give just two examples. I went to talk to a young constable who had proudly bought his own home. He and his family had been burnt out of it by a petrol bomb. They had taken refuge in one of the houses that had been provided expeditiously by the emergency housing authority.

I talked to the young man about the practical questions—what compensation would he get, would he be able to buy another house, would his mortgage be extended, would his bank lend him money when it knew he was a target? But what will remain with me was not our discussion of the practicalities but the look of sheer hurt and bewilderment that he, as a police officer, who had come into the service to do his utmost for the community, should now suddenly be petrol-bombed and burnt out of his home by people who called themselves Loyalists.

The second example was in Dungannon. In the basement of the police station, I was shown six plastic bags. Those contained all that remained of the belongings of three young policewomen. These three girls, all of them of the age to be the daughters, if not the granddaughters, of every hon. Member present, had joined the RUC and were living in flats provided by the police in Dungannon. One night, all three were bombed and everything that they had was smashed or destroyed. All that was left of their possessions was put into the plastic bags. I looked inside and saw a charred squash racket, a few pairs of shoes and some underwear. That was all that was left. And these girls too put it simply: "How can those who call themselves Loyalists do that to us, the police?"

That is the working reality for many Northern Ireland policemen. They are faced with terrible dilemmas a result of the agreement. It is essential that the RUC should not be depicted in Northern Ireland either as the guardians of the agreement, for they are not, or, as some would suggest, as being duty-bound to their communities to oppose the agreement, which they must not do either. The police are politically neutral. They must be impartial. They are not the servants of any Government. They serve the Queen as the limbs of the law. Just as the police during the miners' strike here were not enforcing the wishes of the Government, so the police in Northern Ireland must not be seen to be the enforcers of Government policy either. They must be seen to be the impartial guardians of the law, and they come into the Anglo-Irish agreement only when persons use violence or illegality against it. If the police will keep that clear line in their minds—that they guard the law, not the agreement—many of their dilemmas, I believe, can be resolved.

I turn to some of practical questions that I hope that my hon. Friend will mention in his reply; if he cannot deal with them fully, perhaps we may discuss them in other ways. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West was right to mention Mr. Stalker. I have known a deal about the Stalker investigation for a long time. I confess that I have always visualised a disturbing denouement when all the facts became known.

It is unfortunate that the same chief constable who has been asked to take over Mr. Stalker's investigation—and I wish him good luck in it and hope that he will be speedy in his conclusion — has also been asked to examine the personal allegations against Mr. Stalker. It would have been better if a different chief officer had been asked to deal with the Greater Manchester force problems than the chief officer who has been asked to go to Northern Ireland to carry through the Stalker report. Having the same chief officer doing both is bound to lead mischievous people to conclude that there is a connection between the charges that may be brought against Mr. Stalker and the reason why he has been removed from the Northern Ireland investigation. It would be unfortunate for anything to be done in an official capacity that suggested that Mr. Stalker was removed from the investigation because of what was happening in Northern Ireland.

Some hon. Members may have seen the "Panorama" programme the other night when it was suggested that there was a conspiracy and that Mr. Stalker had been removed from the investigation because he was likely to spill the beans. It was suggested that the RUC, in a subversive manner, had decided to rubbish, devalue and besmirch him and to get him removed from the investigation lest he produced embarrassing matters against them. I have no intimate knowledge of the details. But I suggest that the House would be unwise to adopt the foolish conclusions of the "Panorama" programme.

The inference that the RUC has engaged in a deliberate character assassination of Mr. Stalker to prevent his investigation exposing improprieties in that force is a serious allegation against the Royal Ulster Constabulary. Of course, it must be, and I am sure will be, fully investigated, but I hope that the House will not simply adopt such a smear before the evidence is out. Both in the case of Mr. Stalker personally and in the investigation of the incidents that he was dealing with, it is crucial that the job be now done quickly, that there is full disclosure and that this brave force is able to get back to the real business in hand.

Now to my practical points which are rather like a laundry list, for which I apologise. First, the gag. I hope that my hon. Friend will find—with me if I can help—ways and means of solving the problem of the muzzle that has been placed by the Chief Constable of the RUC on the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. This has gone on for far too long. There is right on both sides—I mean no pun in saying that—but it is urgent that the matter be resolved. There will not be a proper relationship between the Chief Constable and the representative body set up by Parliament until the gag is removed.

It is no less important to make speedy progress with the review of the constitution of the police staff association in Northern Ireland. The time has come to take the federation, which represents 99 per cent. of the men and women of the force, out of the staff association corset, which is cumbersome and unwieldy, and allow it to be treated in the same way as police federations are treated in England and Wales. The more closely we assimilate the staff arrangements of the RUC to those which obtain over here, the better for all concerned.

It is important that the question of federation attendance at the police authority is resolved. I had the opportunity to speak with Sir Myles Humphreys about that the other night. The reasons the police in Northern Ireland are excluded from the police authority—they are admitted in every other force in the United Kingdom—are an insult to them. First, they are not admitted because it is alleged that their presence would impair the confidentiality of the police authority's proceedings. That is absurd. Every police officer in Northern Ireland must sign a declaration under the Official Secrets Act. He is used to keeping confidentiality at all times.

Secondly, the police are kept out of the authority because of impartiality. It is alleged that the impartiality of the police authority would be compromised if the RUC were to be admitted, implying somehow that the federation is a sectarian Protestant body that would upset the balance between the Protestant and Catholic religions. That reason is equally insulting to the federation. I hope that my hon. Friend will try to deal with those petty problems that are impairing morale at a time when it needs to be high.

To conclude, there is progress against terrorism. But difficulties have arisen as a result of the Anglo-Irish agreement. I suspect—I hate to say it—that the Anglo-Irish agreement may, before long, go the way that the Assembly and many of the other constitutional devices that we have attempted to bring in to resolve the problems of Northern Ireland have gone. But whether the agreement stays or goes, I am quite certain of one thing. The future maintenance of public order, the rule of law, the administration of justice, and freedom and security for the people of Northern Ireland must involve cross-border co-operation and a southern Irish dimension. One way or another, that must be brought in to any arrangements for the security and politics of the Province.

To sum it up, many police officers are worried about the Anglo-Irish agreement. Some are bewildered by it. But all of them, operationally, understand the need to work with the Garda.

9.17 pm

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): I understand that it is desired that the debate should conclude as quickly as possible. There are indications from certain quarters that it should conclude at around 10 o'clock. Therefore, I shall not speak for as long as the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) spoke. This is my first contribution to the debate. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said that it was his sixth contribution. I was not looking forward to the debate.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds made the most bizarre speech on law and order that I have heard for some time. He reminded me—it is the last time I shall use the expression tonight—of a well-rehearsed supergrass. The hon. Gentleman bore all the traits of those I have seen in witness boxes, who were put through their paces by Government or whatever section of the police service they worked for, and came up with a well-rehearsed piece of evidence. The hon. Gentleman came up with a well-rehearsed piece of evidence rather than a contribution to the debate.

I have seen terrorism and violence. I know what they are. I shall not fall into the hon. Gentleman's trap of recounting all those instances. They are more gory and greater in number than the hon. Gentleman recounted. Everything I shall say in the debate will be said against the background of my abhorrence of all types of violence, from whatever source. Violence was demonstrated in my constituency on Tuesday. A young man whom I knew well —I know his family well—was found lying dead on the side of a road. He had been shot. That night, when I attempted to get to sleep, 150 people with masks on their faces took over my village. They did so in the name of Unionism, which the hon. Gentleman espouses.

That is the type of situation in which we live, so let us please have no condescension and patronising attitudes. Those who live amongst all that is happening know exactly what it is like. We do not need that sort of patronising attitude shown by anyone.

My first crucial point was touched on in the previous debate on other issues. Can there be natural, normal law in an unnatural, abnormal situation created unnaturally and abnormally to sustain an unnatural and abnormal majority within an abnormally divided country?

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West pointed out that there is a generation of policemen, lawyers and young people who have never known anything but the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978. I did not know anything other than the emergency provisions legislation that went before it, nor did anyone who lived in the north of Ireland. It was much worse than this Act. On one famous occasion, a member of the South African Government claimed to want the provisions of the special powers legislation for his own country. We have had emergency provisions since the day the north of Ireland was founded.

The key question is: can there ever be a normal society, a normal legal process and a normal system of justice in an abnormal society? The answer is no. Unfortunately, as long as Northern Ireland exists and the constitutional position remains unchanged, there will be this type of legislation.

I have always referred to the rake's progress in relation to Northern Ireland because every time one bends the law one makes more paramilitaries. Since 1969, it has been proven conclusively in the north of Ireland that, each time the law is bent, more people join the UDA, UVF, IRA, or INLA. They have been given a reason to become paramilitaries. That rake's progress is there for everyone to see. That is why this legislation is objectionable.

If the legislation were capable of working, it would have worked during the past 64 years, but it has failed. We are faced with the prospect of similar failure during the next 64 years, if this legislation lasts that long. No amount of scare tactics or gory detail will change that reality. To get to grips with the process of justice and law in the north of Ireland, we must realise that reality.

One aspect that is absolutely objectionable in relation to this legislation is the Diplock system in the courts. The House took away the protection that the individual had within the court system — the protection of the jury. While this type of legislation lasts, the House has a duty to replace that protection, at least partially. That will not be the real answer, which is a return to the jury system. Until that system returns, the House must replace it with a system of three judges who hear all cases concerning scheduled offences. Unless that is done, the individual will not have the protection which is normally available under the law and to which he is entitled.

The relationship between policing in Northern Ireland and the position of Mr. Stalker is a controversial point. I found it difficult to restrain myself when the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds was making his references to Mr. Stalker. I met that man and I gave evidence to him. I regard him as a man of immense integrity and professionalism and all the innuendos about him are grossly unfair and not worthy of the type of consideration given to them by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman must have misheard. I did not asperse Mr. Stalker. I share the hon. Gentleman's view about Mr. Stalker's professional competence. However, I believe that the matter of the investigation into this action, which is sub judice, should be completed quickly.

Mr. Mallon: I was saying that it is evident that it is now coming to the point where a man has been removed from his position without knowing why. He has been investigated by the man who has taken over the leadership of his inquiry in the north of Ireland. That is happening within a British society which claims to have total respect for that which is just and right.

There is a grave suspicion in Northern Ireland that Mr. Stalker has opened a can of worms, that that can has spilt out in more places in Northern Ireland, and that that is part of the reason why a good, honest and just policeman has been made a sacrificial lamb in stakes which are much higher than his own position within the Greater Manchester police service.

I have one simple question to ask which is the key to the issue. There are two elements to the report. The first is the substantive element which Mr. Stalker inquired into in relation to the whole ethic of policing, attitudes towards policing and the type of attitude we have seen within a special branch which was a force within a force. Does that report remain with the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Chief Constable and eventually with the Government, or does it die with Mr. Stalker? That investigation and report cannot be repeated by Mr. Sampson unless he is given at least two years.

The other element of the report is that which deals with the incidents themselves. That can, and I hope will, be speedily investigated and concluded by Mr. Sampson. What about the substantive element of the report? Is that the kernel of the problem or will we see that report coming to the Government and to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Chief Constable of the north of Ireland for action? When we know the answer to that, we will know what is behind this problem.

I shall finish on one point, which I raise only because it was raised by the Secretary of State. We are entering into the marching season in Northern Ireland. It is causing and will cause enormous problems for all of us. It is incredible to realise that in 1986 we have over 2,000 such marches in a very small area of land with a very small population. The cost of the marches is incredible, not just financially but in time, inconvenience and loss of businesses. I know, because I live in a village which has a parade of some kind or another every Friday night, apart from those on Sunday. That lasts for seven months of the year.

I listened with interest to the points made and put to the Secretary of State in relation to some other body making the decisions rather than the police. I suggest that it is crucial that the decision must rest with those who take the political decisions because it is only they who can decide whether millions of pounds of our money is spent on making that type of provision. It is only they who eventually will be able, if they have the courage, to say that this cannot continue, year in and year out, to the detriment of the police, business people and everyone trying to live a normal life, and, above all, to the detriment of the public purse. That is where the matter rests.

One of the real challenges of administrative politics is having the courage to go in and make such a decision. No attempt should be made to shove that responsibility on to somebody else. It lies fairly and squarely on the Government Benches.

9.30 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Every three weeks my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State comes to the House and answers questions on Northern Ireland and refers to the current security situation. He gives the good and the bad news. He reports on the number of people who, sadly, have been killed in incidents as a result of the security position in the Province. On 5 June 1986 he gave the good news that so far this year 264 people have been charged with serious offences, including one with murder, and 17 with attempted murder. In the same period, 96 weapons, 10,600 rounds of ammunition and 1,200 lb of explosives have been recovered.

The reason why there is a success story comes straight out of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978. Northern Ireland has been a country of conflict. There is no doubt that the RUC has a difficult task. Wherever its men go they are under constant threat. They are courageous. They have to adopt an impartial attitude to the way in which they are able to enforce the rule of law. Two per cent. of the RUC are members of the Roman Catholic faith. They have to deal with many difficulties. The attitudes which they have to take in fighting terrorism in every way possible should be supported in the House. It does not matter to me how a terrorist is caught as long as he is caught. I want the RUC to be given the best possible powers so that they can maintain a free society in Northern Ireland.

Too many lives have been wasted already and too many lives have been lost. If section 11 gives the power of arrest without warrant of any person suspected of being a terrorist, so be it. That is taking the terrorist off the street. [Interruption.] Labour Members may object to the plain truth, but too many people are suffering in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom and we should give it proper protection.

There are 11,000 members of the RUC and 10,000 members of the Army in Northern Ireland and if we are to catch terrorists they must have every possible resource before them. This order is just one of the useful ways of fighting terrorism. It will not get just the members of the IRA. Indeed, it does not. It will get the paramilitary organisations and the other people who are undermining society over there.

However, we must face the fact that the security forces in Northern Ireland are living dangerously. Fifty-four members of the security forces died in 1985 and 27 have died this year to date. The Democratic Unionist party has said that when the Northern Ireland Assembly goes it will bring politics on to the streets. It is distracting the RUC from trying to catch the terrorist.

The prison officers bravely maintain law and order in the prisons in difficult circumstances, when members of the IRA are deliberately anti-establishment in the prisons. Twenty-four officers have lost their lives in the past 10 years. They need protection on their way home. I want to see more protection for our prison officers. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary replies he will confirm that everything possible is being done to protect the prison officers, not just in the prisons but in their "safe" homes.

The same must be said for all members of the RUC. It is a shocking indictment that a prison officer and a police officer can never be off duty; can never be completely safe. Their names and addresses are openly circulated and if the IRA has an opportunity to get them it will do so because they are seen as the establishment and the IRA will not stomach them.

Therefore, the emergency provisions will help security, just as much as America, which is now responding on the extradition treaty and, indeed, seems to be calming down on the amount of money being sent through Noraid. I believe that our forces are still acting within the law. That is not a hope but a genuine belief. The courts have been very responsible. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, they have difficult duties and responsibilities to bear. When they sentence people—all right, they may have been charged following a supergrass trial they are guilty. The more guilty people who are convicted and put into prison, the better. If it means that there is no time for jury trials, so be it. I have faith in the judicial system in Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already admitted that he will improve safeguards for suspects.

Much has been said about the Anglo-Irish agreement. It is common knowledge that I am not its greatest fan. But it is early days and we cannot yet tell how much improvement there has been in cross-border co-operation. However, it certainly seems better than before. The two police chiefs are now talking to each other, and security on the border is being regularly maintained. The House must always back the security forces in fighting violence.

The agreement has certainly meant close border co-operation. Much more must be done. We are lucky if an IRA attack is shown on national television. We have become rather complacent about the number of attacks and incidents in Northern Ireland. It is no longer news to see someone being bombed. That is no good. We as a people must fight the terrorists, with force if necessary. The Americans, who are still giving to Noraid, would be shocked if they knew how so many brave security officers had been murdered and attacked. If we could give full reports of those incidents and could describe exactly how someone had been murdered, the Americans would no longer believe that they were funding political folk heroes, and would realise that they were funding political cowards who do not believe in the democracy of Northern Ireland.

This order is essential for the continued future and safety of the people of Northern Ireland. They want the order. It has been in existence for a long time. While waiting to be called, I have read the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 in its entirety. Many of its provisions, introduced, incidentally, under a Labour Government, have assured better security for the people of Northern Ireland.

There is always controversy over religion, but talk of the heroes of the south of Ireland is not acceptable to the people of the north. The border must be maintained even more carefully. There must be regular patrols. We must publicise the outrageous acts of the IRA, and be even more prepared, now that Colonel Gaddafi, that madman and warmonger, has announced that he is to recommence donating substantial sums to the IRA, to put all members of the RUC on red alert. Colonel Gaddafi is talking about giving £1·3 million to kill innocent people. That is state terrorism.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): What about the people killed in Libya by aeroplanes from British bases?

Mr. Bruinvels: In the other place the Lord Chancellor said that state terrorism was a treasonable offence and that the death penalty was already available for it. If we had the death penalty for terrorism, the IRA would think again. If three or four terrorists lost their lives, they would not become the martyrs that they imagine. We must be tougher about protecting a very important part of our country. The order will ensure regular safety and protection under the law for the inhabitants of Northern Ireland. We owe that to them. Peace must be maintained. I am surprised that Opposition Members cannot support an order that will ensure peace and that will protect those who need our protection now.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, can you tell me when the winding-up speeches are supposed to begin? I do not want to intrude on anyone's time. I have had to sit and listen to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) speaking for longer than either of the Front Bench spokesmen and the rest of us could not get in to speak. I will be as quick as I can and make a few points.

We have heard miserable nonsense from Conservative speakers and nothing political emerged from the speeches. The Northern Ireland problem is political and it needs political answers. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds spoke at massive length but did not speak a single word of politics. I do not need to say anything about the speech of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

The debate is about the emergency provisions and the account by Sir George Baker. The National Council for Civil Liberties set out in its evidence to Sir George Baker—and this bears out the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon)—the reasons why the council came into being. Having been given so little time to speak, this will be my major point. The NCCL stated that it was Northern Ireland which brought it into being. The NCCL stated in its evidence to Sir George Baker:

> "In 1936, the NCCL established an independent Commission of Inquiry to take evidence in Northern Ireland and to examine the administration and constitutional validity of the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Acts, the precursor of today's Emergency Provisions Act.
> It reported in 1936 and concluded that through the operation of the Special Powers Acts, 'contempt has been begotten for the representative institutions of government'; that 'abrogation of the rule of law has been so practised as to bring the freedom of the subject into contempt'; that the Acts had secured the domination of one political faction which by its actions had driven legitimate movements underground into illegality—thus driving its opponents into the ways of extremists; and lastly that the Acts had been used against innocent people whose injuries had gone unrecompensed and disregarded."

That is the position with the Emergency Provisions Act. It is present because one faction, aided by the Labour party and the Tories, was allowed to develop until it festered and blew up in our faces. In the face of that, all we hear from the Conservatives is a miserable account of what is happening about security. We have not heard a single sentence about how to solve the problem. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), speaking from the Opposition Front Bench—and I am cutting my speech short to hear what he says—will, in all conscience, say something political. The people in Northern Ireland will continue to be slaughtered as long as the border exists, and as long as nothing is done to remove the border which is wrong and abnormal, and which is stealing territory from a sovereign nation which once again wants to be sovereign.

9.43 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am grateful for the opportunity to wind up this debate on behalf of the Opposition and to follow the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). He is absolutely right to say that, in the context in which he made his short intervention, we are dealing with a curious situation in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is a democracy and we are part of a democracy. Northern Ireland has an international border and that border causes total instability and destabilises democracy in Northern Ireland and the democracy of these islands.

I recently had the opportunity to write an article in which I stated that the difficulties and problems of Northern Ireland spoil the harmony of our own country. The problem that we have discussed at length earlier will continue to fester and cause us heartache. However, more than that, it will cause heartache and distress to those who live in Northern Ireland. The consequences of the instability can be seen every day of the week. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) made a long contribution — as he sat through the previous debate for most of the evening—and he referred to the difficulties faced by the police and the attacks made on members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

I have before me a magazine called Focus, the magazine of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. It states:

"In March, 43 police officers had their homes attacked and 11 families have had to flee from certain areas. The attacks . . . have . . . been particularly brutal."

I could go on at greater length, because there are quite a few of those attacks on members of the RUC in Northern Ireland. They have shocked the conscience of the British people as much as the IRA. I have always taken the view that the IRA cannot and will not bomb or terrorise the people of these islands into any sort of submission along the lines of IRA policy. That is inconceivable in the long run. It is similar to the remark that I believe Winston Churchill made in 1943 about Germany and Hitler:

"What kind of people do they think we are?"

What sort of people does the IRA think we are? The paramilitary—those who have perpetrated such violence on members of the Protestant community — equally reveal the deep wells of hatred and cynicism on both sides of the sectarian divide, adding to the destablising situation.

We in the Labour party make no bones about our position. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds spoke in fear of our next election manifesto, and thought that we might have a policy that gave dates for withdrawal from Northern Ireland or some such aspect. I only repeat the remarks made by the Secretary of State earlier. He said that he could not anticipate the legislation to be announced in the Queen's Speech. I cannot anticipate our legislation, and what will be in our manifesto. However, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that our policy is that we believe in a united Ireland. We believe that we should work for that united Ireland. We believe that, in the long run, Ireland will be united in peace and through the consent of the people of the north. That is our objective, and that is our policy.

With regard to the renewal of the emergency provisions, it is a matter of deep regret that they are before us at all. One has to understand the deep anxiety that we feel on issues such as the Diplock courts. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds made an interesting and intriguing point. Will extradition take place from the United States to a country where a judge takes the role of 13 people? He takes the role of the 12 members of the jury and that of the judge. He is not only the arbiter of the law but the arbiter of the facts. In all the cases that I have taken before our criminal courts, the judge always addresses the jury and tells them that the question of fact is a matter for the jury. I respect the judiciary, and I associate myself and my colleagues with the remarks of the Secretary of State about the judiciary in Northern Ireland and the Lord Chief Justice, but it is too great a burden on a single individual for him to have to disseminate the facts as well as the law.

We are most concerned, and have been for many years, about the supergrasses. There was an interesting review of the entire supergrass system in the Law Quarterly Review, in an article by Steve Greer, a lecturer in law at the university of Sussex. He makes several cogent and important points about supergrasses, and about how we in England and Wales have handled the trials of those who have given evidence against their former accomplices. He shows the great discrepancy that is developing between the law of our own country and the law in Northern Ireland. Therefore, it makes us all extremely nervous to be confronted with section 7 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act and to have to vote for it.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said, we repeat our support for the security forces, and for all those who fight terrorism. We are as happy as anyone in this country at the finding of guilty in the Old Bailey trial of the Brighton bomber and his cohorts, and the case of the Droppin' Well incident, when there were pleas of guilty. We support all those actions of the security forces.

We are nervous, and we have consistently pressed the Government to implement the recommendations of the Baker report. I note that the Secretary of State is present for the reply to this debate and we congratulate him on the positive approach he has taken with regard to the implementation of the recommendations of the Baker report. Former Secretaries of State have told us that they proposed to carry forward these recommendations, but tonight we have had an assurance that these recommendations will be brought in within the lifetime of the present Parliament. I do not know whether that gives us a hint as to when the next general election will be, but the promise is welcome.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West has said, we have waited three years and we have still not got those recommendations on the statute book. Therefore, in the interest of our constitutional duties as well as in the interest of the fine balance between the civil rights of an individual and the courts and the powers of the police in our country, we have no alternative—I say this with the utmost sincerity and firmness—but to divide the House.

9.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I apologise in advance that I will be unable to address myself to a number of the detailed points that have been raised in the course of the debate because I have had to truncate my remarks. I recognise that a number of Members have raised questions concerning the Stalker report and I shall address that matter immediately.

I wish to make it absolutely clear that neither my right hon. Friend nor myself have seen the report submitted to the Chief Constable by Mr. Stalker. On 13 June my right hon. Friend told the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) that he understood this to be an interim report. At one point, however, there was a misunderstanding, wherein my right hon. Friend and myself believed it to be a final report on which certain supplementary questions had been asked. In fact, this was an interim report and I regret if anybody has been misled as a result of our misunderstanding.

The task, upon which Mr. Stalker had embarked and had largely completed, will now be carried to its conclusion by the same inquiry team consisting of the same officers but now under the leadership of Mr. Colin Sampson, the chief constable of West Yorkshire. As I have not seen the report, I cannot comment further on the suggestions that have been made in the course of this debate. I certainly agree with those right hon and hon. Members who urge that the report should be carried through to a conclusion as quickly as possible. We are anxious to see that that happens.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), who opened this debate, sought to explain the position of the Labour party in relation to the renewal of these provisions. I would not suggest for one moment that the Labour party is not aware of, and does not sympathise with, the problems that are faced by the security forces in Northern Ireland. I do not question its total opposition to terrorism in the Province, but I question its judgment in deciding to vote against this order tonight. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) that it would be a gross dereliction of duty if this House did not pass this order to renew these provisions which are absolutely essential to the continued battle against terrorism in Northern Ireland.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West implied that, in some way, we now accept these provisions as an entrenched feature of life in Northern Ireland and that they are easily passed by this House. We continue to renew the provisions every six months, to go through them with some care and to answer the points made about them. Equally, we have had frequent and totally independent reviews conducted into the nature of this legislation, most recently by the late Sir George Baker who concluded, among other things, that we could not do without legislation broadly along the lines that at present exists. Nobody takes this for granted and we want, as my right hon. Friend said in opening this debate, the minimum movement away from normality in Northern Ireland necessary to cope with the situation that confronts society, and especially the security forces in the Province.

I cannot comment on the particular case about Miss Walsh which the right hon. and learned Gentleman raised. It predates even my time in Northern Ireland, and I do not quibble. However, the armed forces are empowered to arrest under section 14 and the police under section 11 of the legislation. Therefore, if the armed forces arrested Miss Walsh, they would have done so under section 14. Regarding armed forces' arrests and police arrests, we intend to introduce in an amendment the test of reasonable suspicion. I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will regard that as a move in the right direction. The power of detention is included in section 12, and, although we have no intention of reactivating or reusing that power, the Government judge that it would be premature to remove it from the statute book now.

I must challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman about his allegation of falling standards of justice in Northern Ireland. I do not believe it is possible to follow the road he suggests of ruling out in all circumstances uncorroborated evidence, even where it is given by a former accomplice. However, one can expect the courts to treat any such evidence with the utmost rigour, and in Northern Ireland they do just that.

When the Director of Public Prosecutions decides whether to prosecute, he must make his decision on the basis that if there were a jury a conviction would be likely beyond reasonable doubt. That is the only standard applied by the courts in Northern Ireland. The judges must warn themselves about the danger of accepting such evidence, and if there is a conviction, unlike the position in Great Britain, anyone convicted in a court of first instance or in the High Court of Northern Ireland has an automatic appeal to a three-judge court. The DPP and the judges in the courts in Northern Ireland have, with the utmost integrity, sought in the most difficult circumstances to uphold standards of British justice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds delivered a message to absent Unionist Members of this House with force and vigour, and I hope that they have ears to hear that message. He paid a proper tribute to the police forces of Britain, Ireland and the continent and to the law enforcement agencies in the United States. There is a new mood of co-operation about in the international battle against terrorism. I do not claim that we have beaten terrorism either internationally or within the island of Ireland. The IRA, in particular, and other terrorist organisations retain their ability to murder and maim, but there is a new momentum, not least within the island of Ireland, where it can be attributed to the Anglo-Irish agreement and the impetus that that has given to cross-border security co-operation.

My hon. Friend asked about defendants who might seek to avoid extradition from the United States, even after the passage of the supplementary treaty by the whole of the Senate. He said that they could claim that they had not or would not receive a fair trial in Northern Ireland. I would not expect that to happen. When the United States federal judge Sprizzo upheld Joseph Doherty's appeal against extradition in 1984, he also made absolutely clear his opinion that Doherty had received a fair trial in Belfast in 1981. He specifically rejected the contention that the Northern Ireland system of justice, including Diplock courts, was unfair. We expect United States courts to continue to get that right. It was a most important judgment, of which I hope that other courts in the United States will take note.

In cases where these matters are in dispute, we certainly make available witnesses to go to courts in foreign jurisdictions to give evidence about the nature of the judicial and prison systems in Northern Ireland and any other factors that may be taken into account by the courts.

My hon. Friend went on to pay particular tribute to the men and women of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. That was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) who also mentioned, rightly, the pressures that prison officers are under at present in Northern Ireland, and paid tribute to those prison officers. I endorse both tributes. By financial and other forms of support, the Government have shown their support for the work that has been done by the RUC. Expenditure on the police service has increased fivefold in the last 10 years and there have been two increases in the authorised establishment in the last five years. In terms of the total hours worked in Northern Ireland, we have now the highest level of police effort since the time of the hunger strike in 1981. That shows the Government's commitment to the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Other points have been raised in the debate. I shall write to hon. Members to clear up any outstanding matters. I commend the order to the House.

Council House Sales (Valuation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. [Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

10.12 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Sometimes an hon. Member is able to bring to the attention of the House a particular case which reveals a failing in legislation, and where the Minister, by adminstrative action, can remedy an injustice not just for the citizen who has sought help from his Member of Parliament but for thousands of others as well. The House is considering such a case this evening.

My hon. Friend the Minister, to whom I owe a great deal, will be able, by administrative action, to help not only my constituents Mr. and Mrs. Lee, who have journeyed to Westminster for the debate, but many others in a similar situation. Mr. and Mrs. Lee live at 23 Colwood crescent, Eastbourne. Mr. Lee is a skilled mechanic, working six days a week. His wife looks after their four year old son Daniel. They are a super family. Their house at 23 Colwood crescent is owned by the Eastbourne borough council. Last year, Mr. and Mrs. Lee sought to exercise the right conferred on them by Parliament to buy their own home. On 2 August 1985, the borough secretary wrote to my constituents placing an open market value of £17,500 on the house, from which Mr. and Mrs. Lee were entitled to deduct 39 per cent. because of their nine years' tenancy. Quite properly the borough secretary said in his letter:

"As mentioned in my previous letter, the above property is a prefabricated reinforced concrete house of the 'Parkinson' type. I must point out that should you decide to proceed with the purchase of the property, you will not be entitled to assistance from the Housing Defects Act 1984."

When Mr. and Mrs. Lee received that letter they consulted their Member of Parliament about the value of £17,500 which had been placed on their defective house. On 9 August that Member of Parliament wrote to the borough secretary in the following terms:

"Is it really the view of your Council that, if it was to place this house on the market, the price which it would realise (freehold and with vacant possession) is £17,500? Have you asked Estate Agents for their advice as to the price which they think that they would be able to obtain for your Council, at the present time, if it was minded to sell the house with vacant possession?"

The borough secretary replied on 19 August as follows:

"It is correct that the Council considers the value of the property to be £17,500. I have not sought any advice from Estate Agents on this matter. If Mr. and Mrs. Lee consider that the valuation is incorrect, perhaps you would remind them of their rights under Section 11 which I did point out to them in my letter of 2nd August."

Mr. and Mrs. Lee did indeed exercise their right of appeal to the district valuer. On 28 February 1986 he issued his determination, from which I quote:

"The property was inspected on 16 January 1986 and is a semi-detached, 3 bedroom house of prefabricated reinforced concrete construction with a tiled roof and was built in the 1920s. . . . Representations either verbal and/or written from the landlord and the tenant have been considered together with all relevant valuations and available market evidence. Accordingly I determine the market value in accordance with the Act as at 10 April 1985 at £16,250. . . . No structural survey has been made".

So the district valuer decided not to make a structural survey even though he knew that this was a prefabricated reinforced concrete house of the Parkinson type.

Mr. Lee came to my surgery on 5 April and handed to me the district valuer's determination dated 28 February. Three days later, on 8 April, I wrote to the district valuer as follows:

"My constituent Mr. Glen Lee . . . came to see me on Saturday morning. He handed to me your letter to him dated 28th February 1986, and I have before me a copy of your Determination of the same date. In the sixth paragraph of your Determination you say that you have considered 'all relevant valuations and available market evidence'. So that I may advise my Constituent, could you please make available to me those 'relevant valuations and available market evidence' which you considered? Why did you make no structural survey of this property? Surely, when you know that this is a Parkinson type house, there is a overwhelming case for a structural survey to be carried out?"

The district valuer replied to my letter of 17 April:

"I am looking into the questions you have raised and will write again as soon as possible."

On 21 April the chief valuer's office wrote to me as follows:

"It would not be appropriate for him"

that is the district valuer

"to give you the information which you now request. The DV has made his statutory determination using his professional knowledge and taking into account all relevant matters of which he was aware. . . . I regret that I consider further discussion of any individual cases subsequent to a determination would serve no useful purpose."

I was dissatisfied with that reply from the assistant chief valuer. Three days later, on 24 April, I wrote to the chairman of the board of Inland Revenue, Sir Lawrence Airey, in the following terms:

"In my opinion, the two specific questions which I asked . . .of my letter dated 8th April were reasonable questions to be put by a Member of Parliament, who has been consulted by one of his Constituents. May I ask, please, that you should re-consider the Assistant Chief Valuer's decision not to answer those two questions?"

Meanwhile on 29 April, the private secretary to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction had written to me about a possible approved method of repair for the Parkinson type of house. The private secretary said:

"The NHBC

tells us that two firms are now preparing schemes for the repair of Parkinson houses but that none has yet been submitted for appraisal. We have approached both of those firms . . . direct. Both are engaged in other, commercially more attractive, repair schemes and although they are proceeding with the development of schemes for Parkinson houses, they doubt that these will be submitted for approval until the summer. This means that they could not be approved, if that was indeed the outcome, before the autumn."

I sent a copy of that letter dated 29 April to the district valuer on the following day. I asked him to confirm that when he placed a value of £16,250 on the property he had taken proper account of the information contained in the private secretary's letter. That is relevant, because the building societies are extremely reluctant, and in many cases refuse, to lend on the security of an unrepaired, prefabricated reinforced concrete house. That reluctance or even refusal of building societies is even greater where there is no approved method of repair. I have not received a reply to my letter dated 30 April 1986 to the district valuer, although, in fairness to him, I should say that he has written that he hopes to be able to reply shortly. The answer is simple, had he taken into account that fact of which I believe he was unaware when he made the valuation—namely, that there is no approved method of repair and there will not be one until the autumn of this year.

Another option was open to my constituents. If they were dissatisfied, as they were, and in my view rightly, with the valuation which had been placed on the house originally by the borough council and then the reduced value of £16,250 by the district valuer, it would have been possible for them to have achieved their ambition and hope of becoming owners rather than tenants if the borough council had been willing to move them and their son, Daniel, to another council property and to move into 23 Colwood crescent a family that did not want to exercise the right to buy.

I wrote to the chairman of the housing committee of the Eastbourne borough council on 8 May in the following terms:

"The District Valuer has now re-determined the value of the property at £16,250. Mr. and Mrs. Lee and their Member of Parliament believe that that figure of £16,250 is still much too high; that is to say that if your council was to offer the property for sale with vacant possession, we do not believe that it could find a purchaser who would pay £16,250 for the property. As you know, Building Societies are most reluctant to lend, if they will lend at all, on the security of an unrepaired prefabricated reinforced concrete house . . .

However, the purpose of this letter is to ask whether your Council will please re-consider its decision not to offer a transfer for Mr. and Mrs. Lee. Many of your tenants do not wish to buy their home, or cannot afford to buy their home. Because of the problems, which are self-evident, in Mr. and Mrs. Lee buying their present home, would it not be reasonable for a tenant who did not wish to buy or who could not afford to buy to live at 23 Colwood Crescent, and for Mr. and Mrs. Lee and their son to move into another of your properties, not made of pre-fabricated reinforced concrete?"

On 14 May I received an acknowledgement from the chairman of the housing committee saying that the request which I had made for a transfer would be considered at the meeting of the housing committee on 28 May. To my regret, the chairman has not replied to me, even though the housing committee met as long ago as 28 May.

On 20 May I received a letter from the deputy chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue:

"The District Valuer, who does not act for either party, is required to give his valuation of the price which the property would realise at the relevant time if sold on the open market . . . the District Valuer is put in the position of an independent expert here. The legislation makes no provision for appeal, nor is the District Valuer required to render an account of how his professional judgment was informed and exercised . . . There is no invariable rule on the necessity for structural surveys in the valuation process."

Those are the facts of this case. All that Mr. and Mrs. Lee ask is that they should be enabled to exercise that right to buy which the House has conferred upon them. They have the misfortune—not from their choice, but because of the accident of events—to live in a prefabricated reinforced concrete house owned by Eastbourne borough council. They have a choice—either they can buy their present house at the value determined properly under what is now section 127 of the Housing Act 1985—

"The value of a dwelling-house at the relevant time shall be taken to be the price which at that time it would realise if sold on the open market by a willing vendor"— or the council could, and I believe should, accede to Mr. and Mrs. Lee's request for a transfer to a house of conventional construction.

As to the second option of a transfer, I readily concede that that does not fall within the responsibility of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State or of any of his ministerial colleagues. That is a matter for the borough council. But it is within my hon. Friend's responsibility to deal with this question of a valuation. I believe that in a case of this kind, when it is known that the property is defective and is of a Parkinson type—a type designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984—it is surely right that there should be a structural survey.

Reflect on this: it would be inconceivable for someone buying that house on the open market, knowing of its defects, to proceed without a survey. If that is the standard on which anyone buying in the private sector would insist, there should be no lower standard where the public sector is involved.

I believe that the district valuer should be willing to disclose in cases of this kind the evidence on which he has based his valuation—in this case £16,250. There is no need to give names or addresses. My constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, could have been satisfied, although I think it most unlikely, if the full evidence on which the district valuer had based his valuation had been made known to them and to their Member of Parliament. It is not truth that shrinks from disclosure, it is only the possibility of a valuation which could not be sustained by the facts and the true evidence which shrinks from disclosure.

The deputy chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue was right when he said that under what is now the Housing Act 1985 there is no provision for appeal against the determination by the district valuer. That is so. However, I say to my hon. Friend the Minister that it is always possible to seek a judicial review of conduct of this kind by a district valuer.

The action which I hope that my hon. Friend will take is, as I said, administrative. It does not require legislation. In a case like this the Inland Revenue should ask district valuers to make a structural survey. The Inland Revenue should make available the evidence on which it bases the valuation which is fixed by the district valuer. It is all the more important that that evidence should be made available at the request of the prospective purchaser where there is no right of appeal against the decision of the district valuer.

It may mean that when the story of these times comes to be written the case of the Lee family will not receive even a footnote in the history books. However, their case is one which deserves the sympathetic consideration of the Government. The case of Mr. and Mrs. Lee is reproduced over and over again in other constituencies, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to give me the assurances for which I ask. I remind my hon. Friend that there remains one last protection for a citizen who has been treated unfairly and that is to petition the courts for a judicial review of an administrative decision of this kind.

10.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I begin by saying how fortunate Mr. and Mrs. Lee are to have such a diligent Member to champion their case in the House. No one who listened to what my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said could fail to be moved by the story of Mr. and Mrs. Lee, who are simply trying to exercise a right given to them by Parliament and purchase a house at a price that they feel to be fair.

Some of the questions put to me by my hon. Friend fall outside my ministerial responsibility. As he will know better than me, part of the responsibilities he referred to relate to the Treasury. The particular points he put to me, that it should be mandatory to make a structural survey and that evidence should be disclosed by the district valuers, are matters which fall to my colleagues at the Treasury to whose attention I shall bring those observations.

My hon. Friend's contributions on the subject of the right to buy are always particularly welcome in view of his knowledge and experience as a former Minister for Housing and Construction. Indeed, he is the architect of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, which made important improvements in the right-to-buy scheme.

I know, from the work I have done with my hon. Friend, how concerned he has always been to ensure that right-to-buy valuations should be fair. I hope to refer to some of the steps that he took as Minister for Housing and Construction to test their accuracy.

There has been a debate on this matter in the context of the Housing and Planning Bill, which provides for an increase in the discount on a flat sold under the right to buy. The case which my hon. Friend has raised, that of Mr. Glen Lee, concerns a house rather than a flat, a house built of prefabricated reinforced concrete — PRC for short. But the same issue arises — how to establish a fair valuation for a type of property that rarely changes hands on the open market.

My hon. Friend asked some specific questions about the valuations and about making evidence available. In view of his interest, and because I knew that he was going to ask the specific point, I have made some inquiries. I think that my hon. Friend understands that I am not able to reveal the prices at which other Parkinson houses in the area have changed hands because that would be a breach of confidence.

However, I understand that other sales have taken place at prices higher than the value that the district valuer has determined for Mr. Lee's house. That is not conclusive evidence in itself. We do not know how far those prices took account of the nature of the properties, but they do provide a useful input for the district valuer's valuation. Those facts were taken into account, together with other information about the local property market.

Listening to my hon. Friend's speech, it was not quite clear whether he had in his possession a letter to him dated 18 June from the district valuer/valuation officer, dealing with some of the points that he had put in his earlier letter. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend has that letter which begins:

"I hope this reply will reach you in time for Thursday's debate."

Mr. Gow: No.

Sir George Young: It is a misfortune of the post that the copy has reached me but the original has not reached my hon. Friend.

Mr. Gow: What date is it?

Sir George Young: It is dated 18 June and is marked "FIRST CLASS POST".

That letter answers the specific questions that my hon. Friend has put. He asked about the repair schemes for Parkinson houses and that is referred to at the end of the letter where it says:

"As to the matter of repair schemes for Parkinson houses, naturally the property Press is looked at constantly to monitor progress on all PRC houses and although I am aware that steps have started to prepare schemes for Parkinson houses, my determination is related to 10 April 1985 which was before applications were invited for approval."

The letter also deals with other points. I hope that my hon. Friend will receive it in his post tomorrow morning.

In the correspondence my hon. Friend asked what evidence had been taken into account in this determination. The second point that he put to me was why no structural survey had been carried out. I think that my hon. Friend has seen the response given in the correspondence. I am advised that structural surveys of non-traditional houses are of little practical value unless "destructive survey techniques are used."

Those involve the removal of linings and renderings which could cause considerable damage to the property and so might not be acceptable to the prospective purchaser.

But the district valuer had taken into account the report of, at the time, a recent survey of the property which had been carried out by the local authority's structural engineer. The district valuer also considered a report produced by the Building Research Establishment on the structural condition of Parkinson-framed houses.

It seems to me, listening to the debate, that the most fruitful course, given that there is no appeal against the district valuer's valuation, is to pursue the question of a transfer. As my hon. Friend said, it is not a matter within my power to compel Eastbourne borough council to offer a transfer to Mr. and Mrs. Lee and I was distressed to learn that my hon. Friend had not had the courtesy of a reply from the chairman of the housing committee. But if the debate has served any useful purpose, it might increase the pressure on the borough council to offer a suitable property, I hope not of PRC construction, to Mr. and Mrs. Lee. The discount is, of course, transferable should they move to another local authority home. That would be an honourable way out.

An alternative approach is for Mr. and Mrs. Lee not to complete the purchase — they are under no obligation to do so — and if they feel, as my hon. Friend does, that the valuation is unrealistic, and that subsequent events will prove that to be the case, they can reapply at a later date and have another valuation put on the property. They will be entitled to a higher discount as the years roll by. The points concerning the Treasury will be referred to my hon. Friend the Minister, and I know that he will want to write and deal with the specific comments made.

One cannot be complacent about the valuation of property sold under the right to buy. My hon. Friend outlined a real difficulty when the district valuer is required to determine the value of a property that is of a kind that does not change hands often. In such a case, the valuer must make the best use he can of such market evidence as is available. The Government do not think it appropriate to set up a special system of forced sales, which my hon. Friend put forward as one solution to deal with the question of the valuation of flats, particularly in high-rise blocks. There would also be difficulties in arranging for a test sale of a comparable property whenever there is difficulty in valuing a PRC house such as Mr. Lee's.

But we are monitoring re-sales of former council properties in selected areas in order to look for signs that the original valuations were excessive, and will certainly look very carefully at any evidence that there is a significant problem. As my hon. Friend will know from the exercise that he initiated in the London boroughs of Wandsworth and Ealing, the initial valuations by the district valuer were proved to be roughly in line with market valuations when other flats in the same block were put on the market. I realise that my remarks will not be of any great consolation to Mr. and Mrs. Lee, and that is as much a matter of sorrow for me as for my hon. Friend. But if the possibility of a transfer can now be vigorously pursued with Eastbourne borough council, my hon. Friend's initiative may not have been in vain.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

The Arts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

9.35 am

The Minister for The Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I am delighted to have this opportunity to debate the arts. The arts are a British success story. Not only can we take pride in our rich heritage, but we can marvel at their almost astonishing vigour over recent years. They have enjoyed a remarkable expansion on nearly every front.

Since the last war, seven new opera companies and five major new dance companies have been established. Since 1967, the number of arts centres has risen almost tenfold. Over the past 15 years the number of museums in England and Wales has doubled. Over 40 million people a year now attend our museums and galleries and, in the past 30 years, over 30 new theatres have been set up in England alone. It is telling, at a time of considerable national excitement over England's fortunes in the football World Cup, that more people now attend the theatre in Britain than go to football matches.

Increasingly, the arts are a resource for the many, and not confined to the few. That is exactly how it should be. The arts cannot, and will not, grow in a vacuum. They must have an audience. As they expand, this audience—and they have shown quite clearly their capability to do so—they will also enrich and enliven everybody's existence. As Keats said:

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever".

No more impressive example of such vigour and commitment is available than the story of the arts since the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan councils. Hon. Members will remember the dark forebodings, the prophecies of doom and Armageddon that flowed from the lips of Opposition spokesmen. We were warned of worthy arts bodies going to the wall, and bleak forecasts were made of first-class artists finishing up in the dole queue. Despite all that, and despite some moments of very real and understandable uncertainty, this has proved to be a success story. The fact is that funding from central Government and local government has more than filled the overall gap left by abolition. This in itself is a tremendous achievement.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I am sorry to intervene so early in the Minister's speech, but he should not be quite so controversial so early in the morning. No one has said that the immediate impact on the arts following the abolition of the GLC and MCCs would be one of appalling slaughter of the innocents. We know that it will work its way through the system. The Minister intends to reduce the amount of substitute money that he put in to replace the GLC's and MCC's money. He should not congratulate himself quite so soon.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. In a moment I shall return to the point. I shall quote exactly what the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) said last autumn.

The blossoming of the arts can be helped and facilitated by the Government, but essentially it depends upon the creativity of individuals. British creative genius has left us an artistic heritage among the richest in the world. Britain's artistic life and heritage acts as a powerful magnet for tourism from overseas which in turn means more jobs and a better standard of living for us in this country. Former United States President Jimmy Carter this week is giving welcome encouragement to American tourists by his visit to Wales to see the home of one of our finest poets, Dylan Thomas. Against the background of this efflorescence of individual talent, the Government's basic political pledge to the arts was clear: to keep up the level of Government support and to create the right climate in which the arts could develop and grow by attracting additional support from other sources. That pledge has been kept.

In fact, our spending record outstrips our manifesto commitment. Since 1979-80, central Government spending on the arts, libraries, museums and galleries has gone up by more than 10 per cent. in real terms, or 25 per cent. if this year's extra central abolition money is included. Within this context of growth, let me now turn to specific areas within the arts, each with its own admirable success story.

Since 1979-80, we have increased the Arts Council's grant from £62 million to £136 million or by some 7 per cent. in real terms—32 per cent. including abolition money. We have strongly supported the Arts Council in its "The Glory of the Garden" strategy which is delivering to the regions a fairer share of the overall arts budget.

In now turn to abolition. It is right that I should return to that success story. It is fair, I think, for me to quote the hon. Member for Paisley, South, who on 21 October 1985 referred to as a result of abolition.

"the cataclysmic collapse in arts funding". [Official Report, 21 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 16.]

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South) rose—

Mr. Luce: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will let me complete this passage. He will have a full chance to reply to it.

Let me now contrast that statement with what actually happened in the real world. The Government gave a total of more than £43 million of extra taxpayers' money to help safeguard the arts in the abolition areas, £17 million of which went to the museums and galleries, and £25 million of which went to the Arts Council. Partly due to the negotiating success of the Arts Council the British Film Institute and the regional arts associations, and partly due to the positive co-operation of the successor authorities, now relieved as they are of the substantial precepts formerly paid to the GLC and the other metropolitan counties, some £15 million of local authority funding was secured. Only last week, I was glad to note that the last remaining major problem area of Merseyside had achieved a settlement of its funding of the arts. That agreement means that no major problems remain. Indeed, the fact that the overall combined subsidy from central and local government will be substantially up in real terms over the previous year's figure represents a very notable achievement. I must congratulate the Arts Council, the BFI, the regional arts associations and the local authorities concerned.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Without widening the debate unacceptably, does my right hon. Friend accept that the extravagant remarks of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) are typical of what was said by those who opposed the abolition of the GLC? We were promised race riots, the end of travellers' free passes, rates explosions, and so on. Remarks on the future of the arts were made in that extraordinarily and ridiculously extravagant context. I am pleased that they have been proved to be totally erroneous. My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on that.

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree that now is the time to compare the remarks made at that time by Labour Members with what events have demonstrated.

The Arts Council allocated some £9 million to the South Bank board. Its chairman, Mr. Ronnie Grierson, and its staff have managed the takeover of the South Bank with great skill. Their intention is to produce a coherent strategy for the whole complex, making it an arts centre to rival any such arts centre anywhere in the world. This lively and impressive approach will, I am sure, meet an enthusiastic response from the public.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luce: I have just given way. The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to contribute to the debate, as he so often does.

The BFI is adding to the glories of the South Bank by constructing a museum of moving image. The BFI made it clear from the outset that this was an enterprise that it could manage on its own, and indeed it has. The institute has raised £5 million from private sources for it and the museum will open in the latter half of next year. I wish it every success.

The BFI is constructing also a new conservation centre for the National Film Archive. This is a splendid example of plural funding in action. The BFI has raised £3 million from private sources for it. We have not reduced the level of central Government funding to it just because these private funds have become available. I am conscious that organisations such as the BFI should not be penalised for their success in raising private funding.

In the six years from 1979-80 funding from the arts budget for the national museums and galleries increased by 15 per cent. in real terms—once again a picture of growth. It is fair to say that we have concentrated this increase on much needed capital works and maintenance and on improving the conservation and display of existing stocks and that we have, as a consequence, restricted the overall level of purchase grants. But, we now have the National Heritage Memorial Fund to ease the pressure in that respect.

Looking to the future, the picture is one of general further expansion and development. With commendable initiative, for instance, the Imperial war museum is raising £2·5 million to help supplement Government funding for a major redevelopment; and, to take another example, the "Tate in the North" project will be a significant boost for the Merseyside area.

I am anxious to help the museums and galleries meet the challenge of the late 1980's, which I think I can sum up as making themselves more outgoing and as making themselves more attractive to an increasingly discriminating public. That is why I lose no opportunity to encourage museums and galleries to make their collections more available and accessible to the widest possible audience. They must not be tempted to sit on their treasures. It is right that I should pay tribute to the fast-changing image of the world of museums and galleries from that of fusty buildings housing static displays to that of exciting centres of interest and enjoyment. The growth and vitality of independent museums are critically important here. They are on the leading edge of change. Recently, I visited the Ironbridge Gorge museum, where through the commitment and innovatory talent of its administrators and staff, a whole valley once in decay or decline has been completely revitalised. Earlier this week, I was pleased to announce the museum of the year award to another independent museum, the Beamish museum, which once again has expended effort on making its exhibits "live" and on cultivating the virtues of personal warmth and human interest that act as an irresistable draw to members of the public.

I was very pleased therefore, to be able to announce formally on Monday of this week the implementation of my plans to change the financing arrangements of the nationals to grant-in-aid. Not only will they now have the important flexibility of carrying money over from one financial year to the next and of retaining the revenue earned through their own efforts but, critically, this measure will give them a stimulus to implement innovative marketing strategies.

One of the most important responsibilities of Government is to safeguard Britain's priceless heritage. This has been a major part of our strategy since 1979. In 1980, for instance, we created the National Heritage memorial fund. Since then, it has received over £60 million of public funds. This has enabled the fund to help save for the nation stately homes such as Keddleston, Weston park, and Calke abbey.

Last year, the Government announced an important improvement in the arrangements for acceptance of works of art in lieu of tax. This allows access to the Contingency Reserve for acceptances of pre-eminent heritage items up to an average of about £10 million a year. Wider publicity for these arrangements could help to reap a fine reward for posterity.

I attach great importance to my responsibilities, which cover public libraries, although, of course, the vast bulk of expenditure on libraries is undertaken by local authorities, supported by the rate support grant. The Government have taken two major initiatives: first, we have introduced the public lending right scheme, intended to give a fair return to authors and reflect the size of their readership in public libraries; secondly, we have begun work on the very major project of building a new and modern British library at St. Pancras. On final completion this new library will provide splendid conditions, and house 180 miles of shelving for 12 million books. Services for readers will be immeasurably improved, as will conservation of the books. The tiresome shuffling of stored books between 20 buildings in Greater London will then be a thing of the past.

Crafts go from strength to strength with more and more people taking up crafts, both professionally and as a leisure interest. The Crafts Council has recently devised a strategy for the national development of the craft economy and education.

As the House knows, the United Kingdom will shortly assume the Presidency of the European Council of Ministers. On the arts side, the United Kingdom is taking the initiative in pressing for more co-operation in sponsorship, conservation and public lending right. During our Presidency, I hope to announce the Government's choice of the United Kingdom city that will become the European city of culture in 1990.

I have spoken of the basic pledge fulfilled by the Government of keeping up support for the arts. Of course, I realise that there are considerable pressures on many arts bodies in the light of the expanding demand and that Government funding falls short of meeting their full aspirations. However, my task goes far beyond setting the priorities of core support. The Government have a broader role than just producing £320 million worth of taxpayer's money for the arts. Indeed, Government expenditure on the arts has never been more than a modest proportion of the total amount of money flowing in to the arts. Essentially, my task is to create the framework and conditions under which the arts can flourish. In pursuing that strategy we have undertaken a co-ordinated pattern of measures and initiatives that I believe now open up prospects of unparalleled opportunity for the arts in this country. I hope that the various arts bodies will respond eagerly to the challenges which this new climate of opportunity presents.

Firstly, let us deal with the challenge of business sponsorship. Business sponsorship of the arts has increased dramatically in recent years and now plays an important part in the funding of the arts. From the starting point of £500,000 in 1976 business sponsorship has now risen to over £20 million per year. The Government's business sponsorship incentive scheme, introduced in 1984, must take a good deal of the credit for that impressive performance. Over £7 million has been raised in that way.

The strengthened Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts has also ably administered the incentive scheme on my behalf. I shall be announcing more awards under the scheme in two weeks. In addition, one of the largest arts sponsorship programmes ever undertaken by a first-time sponsor will be announced shortly. It will be of tremendous benefit to the arts organisations involved. Recently I announced the continuation of the scheme for 1987-88 and I hope that arts bodies and sponsors will continue to exploit the opportunities it offers to the full.

Then we have the challenge of private patronage. The arts have always enjoyed important support from private patrons ranging from the very wealthy to the very humble. In recent years we have seen a major upsurge in private giving to the arts. As the House knows, Mr John Paul Getty II has made major contributions to British arts and heritage, principally to the BFI and the National Gallery. I hope that the House will share my plesure on learning of Mr. Getty's honorary knighthood, announced last Friday.

We have also seen a most notable contribution from the Sainsbury brothers with their generous commitment to the National Gallery extension. Nor should we forget Mrs. Sainsbury – no relation – with her donation to the Royal Opera House and Miss Woodroffe with he donation to the National Art-Collections Fund. Gifts from major patrons have ranged from £1 million to £50 million. In addition to those gifts of cash, the arts also benefit from gifts in kind. An important recent example was the gift of the trustees of the Stefan Zweig collection to the British library of a very important collection of 180 musical and literary autographed manuscripts spanning three centuries. I join the British library in regarding that as an act of outstanding generosity to the nation.

Then we have the challenge of the Budget changes. The Government are proud of their record in improving the tax incentives and tax reliefs for charitable giving, particularly through the covenanting system. No one should underestimate the Government's major proposals in the 1986 Budget designed to encourage and stimulate charitable giving. In all, they represent an immense opportunity for the arts to develop and expand their plural funding.

A new tax relief for single gifts by companies to charities will bring valuable benefits for both revenue and capital projects. From the beginning of April this year, companies will be able to obtain relief on donations to charities up to a limit of 3 per cent. of the dividend paid in any one year. By introducing relief for single gifts, we are offering companies greater flexibility to arrange their charitable giving. Those arrangements will allow a company that might hesitate about taking on a commitment over several years to undertake to give what it can when it can.

Perhaps the most radical innovation is the proposed introduction of the new payroll giving scheme next year. From April next year employees will be able to have up to £100 a year for charitable gifts deducated from their pay and relieved of taxation. Schemes will have to preserve the donor's freedom of choice and the Government intend that they should be economical to run both by the Revenue and by employers.

Of course, we must control any possible misuse of charitable reliefs for tax avoidance purposes. With that in mind the 1986 Budget introduced measures to control these abuses. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's announcement on 4 June should allay fears that the anti-abuse provisions in the Finance Bill will adversely affect arts bodies.

These various new Budget reliefs, combined with those that already exist, now add up to a very substantial package of measures, providing a powerful stimulus to the expansion of private funding of the arts.

As I have said, the arts do not live in a vacuum: they depend critically on their relationship with their audience. Reaching the public is not only a measure of appreciation of success of the arts, it also provides a source of income, in sum much greater than that derived from the state. For that reason, marketing is something that no sector of the arts can afford to neglect. Small percentage increases in attendances can make all the difference to the finances of many arts bodies. Consumer spending is buoyant and more and more money is being spent on leisure. Arts bodies can gain by making their grants go further through managing themselves as efficiently as possible, and by marketing themselves more effectively. Marketing is not, and should not be, a dirty word in the arts world. After all, no skilled gardener would wish his roses to blush unseen.

To sustain the momentum of this sea change in attitude, I am currently studying ways in which my office could help to encourage arts bodies to market and manage themselves even better. I welcome the Arts Council's own initiatives in that regard. I believe that we are beginning to see examples of many arts bodies showing more thrust in the marketing sense.

Against the background of all the initiatives that we have undertaken there remain some differences of approach between ourselves, and the Opposition parties. Let me deal briefly with the alliance position. The Social Democratic Party has not produced a policy paper on the arts in its first five years. Perhaps that is an indication of the priority which it attaches to the field. In 1982, the Liberals produced a paper promising a wide range of uncosted measures, and the establishment of what seemed like a centralised sounding ministry of culture. Perhaps the two parties ought to get their act together, as they should on their defence policy.

There are two aspects of the Labour party policies that I should highlight. First, Labour would take the funding responsibilities away from the Arts Council, and deal direct with the regional arts associations. That inevitably implies greater centralisation, more direct Government intervention, and most important, an abandonment of the arm's length principle, upon which the independence and free expression of the arts has hitherto depended.

Secondly, the hon. Member for Paisley, South has announced Labour's intention to double expenditure on the arts. I suspect that he means to double it, not as the Government have doubled in cash terms over a period of years, but rather at a stroke as part of Labour's totally unrealistic and dangerous programme of £24 billion of extra Government expenditure. I wonder to what extent the hon. Gentleman is aware of the more realistic approach of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) who said on 13 May:

"The days have gone when we could hope to achieve all our ambitions in the lifetime of a single Parliament. It is necessary for us to fix our clear priorities and to insist that all other tasks and targets take second place."

Perhaps the hon. Member for Paisley, South can reassure us as to whether his proposals have now become a little more realistic.

Sustaining the level of public funding for the arts, and encouraging a new climate of opportunity for the arts add up to a substantial record of achievement for this Government. We have fully accepted the responsibility to supply the core funding needed to preserve our heritage, sponsor excellence and to provide the seedcorn for experimental work and pump-priming. We have also enabled the arts to grow and prosper to meet the rising and legitimate public demands upon them.

The late John F. Kennedy said:

"The life of the arts, far from being an interruption, a distraction in the life of a nation, is very close to the centre of a nation's purpose, and is a test of the quality of a nation's civilisation."

By any standards, the strength of Britain's artistic life ensures that we pass that test with flying colours. But the quotation also has a deeper significance. The arts lie at the heart of our civilisation. They are not something monolithic, which can be developed by diktat from above. The strength of our arts lies in their diversity and independence. The best way of safeguarding that and providing the basis for sustainable growth is for arts bodies not to be dependent on a single source of finance, but to draw their funding from a variety of sources among which the public itself must always be a vital component. I have explained how the Government have devised a framework by which those developments can be facilitated.

All too often, we in Britain have the habit of running ourselves down, always looking on the black side, and failing to recognise genuine opportunities and successes. That national habit of self-denigration is nowhere less appropriate than in the arts today. Increasingly we are seeing more and more of our population enjoying the entertainment and enlightenment which the arts offer. Government policies have created a climate of opportunity to continue that remarkable expansion. For all our sakes, it is important that the arts bodies respond to that challenge and opportunity with an appropriate alacrity.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to express my gratitude in particular to the shadow Minister for the Arts, the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who has consented to let me speak at this point, as well as to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), a fellow supporter of Plymouth Argyll who, surely, had a higher claim than did I.

The Minister said that the Social Democratic party seemed to give little priority to the arts, in that it has been in existence for some time and its publications have not yet come to the Minister's attention. I remind him how little priority his Government give to the arts, in having this important debate on a Friday morning, at short notice, when so many people who would have wanted to be here are unable to do so. I accept that it is not the Minister's own doing. Nevertheless, while he is performing a considerably appreciated job at the Office of Arts and Libraries, it is a disservice of Government to have a debate of this importance on a Friday.

I welcome much of what the Minister has done in the way of tax relief and personal schemes, and some of what he has done for the libraries and museums is appreciated there. However, rather than using my speech to make party political capital, I am concerned with the job of Government vis-a-vis the arts: it is to create a climate in which they can flourish. What is needed is an economy that is sufficiently buoyant to permit people to go to see the living arts, music, drama, ballet in which quality must be encouraged. That can be done only by underwriting the centres of excellence. Every person who goes to the National Theatre, the Royal Opera House or the ballet, then goes back and takes his enlightenment and joy to wherever he came from, and perhaps tries to emulate it for his own community.

It is right for the Government not only to encourage more people to participate in the arts, but to make it easier for them by providing transport and ensuring that the training schools for actors and dancers and musicians continue to flourish, in underpinning the infrastructure of training that is so necessary if our supreme position in the arts is to be maintained.

I understand that, pound for pound, we are lower in the league table than most other countries in Europe, but I also accept that the highly sophisticated schemes that were introduced recently are of enormous help and benefit to the theatre. There is the imaginative business support for the arts scheme and incentive schemes. I wish that more people in the House would realise how much those who participate in the live theatre appreciate the presence of the Minister, and of Members of Parliament in general at live performances because it is our endorsement of the living arts that makes those artists feel that we are on their side.

The Edinburgh festival is a marvellous example of what can be done without a proscenium arch and all the impedimenta that most theatres possess. At Edinburgh, one can go into the station waiting room and the actors will show one a marvellous production with dancing and music. There is now a scheme where one can have actors come into one's own hotel room and produce a play there. If one has a bathroom, they will present an even better play.

I very much share in what the Minister said about marketing. I hope that the next time he looks at the business sponsorship scheme, he will make it clear to businesses that, on the whole, what theatre people need most is marketing expertise which, mostly by being theatricals, they tend to lack.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Freud: I shall let the hon. Gentleman make his own speech.

Mr. Jessel rose——

Mr. Freud: I shall give way if the hon. Gentleman insists.

Mr. Jessel: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I intervene as I believe that he is leaving early. He referred to business sponsorship. Is he aware that his party's so-called manifesto for the arts in 1984 referred to business sponsorship as being of marginal importance? Will he repudiate that absured statement in veiw of the growing and tremendous importance of business sponsorship, which has increased 40-fold to £20 million a year in the past 10 years?

Mr. Freud: I am sorry that I gave way. It wastes time. Of course, business sponsorship is of marginal importance, and of course every item of marginal importance adds up to being quite important in the long run. Let us not overestimate. I am sure that not even the Minister would.

I want specifically to raise one point in respect of a constituent of mine who has a theatre. I shall concentrate for a moment on that venture, which is a summer theatre. It runs for eight weeks. The company takes over the church hall with the good will of the local community, and translates that church hall to a theatre between Friday evening, when the school has its prizegiving to the Saturday first night. The company puts in raised seating, curtains, flowers, a bar, a restaurant and so on.

The local authority—Waveney council—gives £4,000 towards the theatrical production. All local shopkeepers take advertising space. Lloyds Bank gives a small amount of money. The Happy Eater up the road takes the back page of the programme, and pays more than its due. The theatre is encouraged by the whole community. In a season, there are 30 actors, a producer, a manager, a director, a cloakroom lady, a designer, a stage manager, a props manager and a costume lady. Each gets £110 a week, which is the minimum and also the maximum. Many of the actors are playing at night, rehearsing in the daytime and, late at night, reading the part that they will start rehearsing in two weeks' time. At the end of the 1985 season, with a 94·6 per cent. attendance in a 226-seat theatre, the company lost £158, but the VAT man received £3,428.

I have gone on a bit on that subject because the constituent involved is my wife, and I know about the financial sacrifices. It seems to me that if the Government genuinely want to help the theatre, an awful lot of giving that is being done now could be achieved much more successfully if so much were not taken away through VAT which in other, and more enlightened countries is either at a much lower rate or non-existent for the living arts.

I am grateful for having been called before the hon. Member for Paisley, South. I wish the debate all the power and success that it deserves.

10.10 am

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I, too, thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for co-operating in allowing a slight role-reversal.

I tend to come to these debates with two thoughts. First, I have such a mass of material that I do not know how to arrange it. Secondly, as I arrive at the Dispatch Box, I think that I have nothing to say. Then I hear the Minister and, by jove, there is plenty to say.

The uxorious Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) was right to complain about the Government's habit of choosing occasions for debates on the arts when it is difficult to obtain publicity. The last time that we had a major debate on the arts, they chose the day of the European elections. Today, despite the major arguments raging about the arts, the debate is on a motion for the Adjournment of the House and on a Friday. That is disgraceful. It is not good enough for the Minister to make his lying-in-state speeches about the state of the arts when the Government are not prepared to meet the challenge by allowing the House to debate and vote on the matter in prime time on a proper day when the House could express its feelings about the arts.

Mr. Jessel: Why not use a Supply day?

Mr. Buchan: After the boasting that we heard from the Minister this morning, the Government should be proud to put their record before the House without waiting for a Supply day.

The picture that the Minister paints of the arts bears no relation to the picture seen by everyone involved in the arts. A week ago, he and I met two of the leading administrators in Britain, one theatrical and the other involved with museums. They spent most of the time discussing the problems of having to scrabble, for funds from various sources. Of course, there is a case for a multiplicity of funds. However, a few months ago, I spoke to a group of arts administrators in Birmingham who represented 70 organisations. Each of them said that instead of spending time developing an arts policy in development and in planning, he was having to spend time searching for funding. That is the picture of the arts today.

The Minister reminds me of the story from Stendhal which my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau

[Mr. Buchan]

Gwent (Mr. Foot) once mentioned. The husband entered a room and found his wife in flagrante delicto. As he upbraided her, she said, "How do you dare to put the evidence of your eyes before taking my word for it?" The Minister uses statistics to suggest that the arts are healthy, but those involved know they are not. One reason is that this philistine Government — philistine because as monetarists they believe that cash is the only solution — are not even good monetarists. They see the deployment of money only as expenditure and, therefore, in the Prime Minister's terms, wasteful, instead of as an investment. They forget that such expenditure can be an investment.

Although the Minister is a decent and nice guy, he does not give the impression of understanding the pressure and urgency of the matter. His language is the language of generosity — of the Government having given this and that — and he gave a list of patrons and donors. I am prepared to honour the Gettys and the Sainsburys of this world for what they have done for the arts. It is perhaps an honour to them, but it shames the Government that those patrons have had to protect and defend our national institutions, such as the National Gallery, against the Government's depradations. The Government should not boast about the fact that Getty has saved the National Gallery, which the nation should be protecting and developing. The Government claim that the concept of patronage and sponsorship of the arts, which is too often a mark of shame to them, is somehow an honour for them.

The Government's failure to understand the importance of the arts either in human, spiritual terms or in economic terms has been a catastrophe. The Minister said that he would consider the British application for the city of culture of 1990, but he has already warned local authorities that no Government resources will be available. Can one imagine Greece, France or Germany inviting applications for a city of culture but then saying that no Government support would be available? The Government are mean-minded and petty, and it is time that they altered their attitude to the arts.

The Government take some pleasure in poking fun at the Liberal party and the SDP for not having a cultural policy. The Minister has forgotten the essay written by the good doctor, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), for the National Campaign for the Arts paper. The good doctor said that the arts were important because they helped to create a climate of awareness in which ideas can be more readily received. He quoted two examples — "Cathy Come Home" and "The Boys from the Blackstuff". I was interested in all that, because I wrote exactly the same thing a year before the good doctor did. I am pleased that the SDP is picking up intelligent policy from somewhere, even if it is only from us.

The Minister also mentioned the problems of libraries. The moneys forthcoming from his Department are not for libraries in general. The bulk of the money is for the necessary expansion of the British library. They boast that they will pay for an expansion that is being forced upon the library. The truth is that the funding of public libraries has collapsed by 15 per cent. during the past five or six years because of the squeeze on local authority funding.

The Minister's main point was abolition. Again, he treated it as a success story for the Government, because other people have pulled together to save something from the wreckage that the Government's philistine and reckless decision imposed upon local authorities and the arts. The decision to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan county councils was done out of political pique and dislike of Mr. Ken Livingstone. For no intelligent reason, the arts were wrecked and everyone had to pull together to salvage them. The Minister said that the Government have more than recompensed the arts. Does he remember that the grant was already £10 million short — at that level of Arts Council spending, it meant about 10 per cent. short — of what the Arts Council and the local authorities, with Government backing, estimated was necessary? And that was on top of another £9 million already short — £19 million in all. Instead of the £35 million that was estimated to be necessary, the Government gave £25 million and boasted that they had solved the problem. The truth is that the intelligent work of the Arts Council, the intelligent organisation, discussion and hard negotiation by the regional arts associations, and the generosity of local authorities — even though they faced cuts in Government funding — saved the Government's bacon. Yet the Government now boast that they have solved the problems that they created, and more than recompensed the arts. Next year, there will be another cut in funding. The Government will create a taper in the former metropolitan county and GLC areas.

The Arts Council, not a body given to making alarmist statements, said:

> "The Council is alarmed at the prospect of a reduction in 1987-88 in its funds for organisations affected by abolition . . . The Government has suggested that the Council's funds for this purpose will be reduced from £25 million to £21 million in 1987-88. This would considerably impair its ability and that of the RAAS to maintain current activities, particularly if spending by local authorities is also to be further restricted."

The Arts Council estimates that its base line grant next year, according to Government indications, will be 2·5 per cent. in cr[illegible], but costs in the arts are under more severe pressure than the retail price index.

They say the council's grant is "likely to be cut again in real terms." The Government have boasted of expanding art funding, but the reality which confronts everybody involved is that there are cuts. There are cuts despite the 4 or 5 per cent. increase because so much of that is earmarked, because of Government intervention in relation to Priestley and because they are using a wrong deflator to claim increases.

The hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy), no doubt in association with the Minister — that is fair enough as it is part of the procedures of the House — has asked a series of questions to elicit by how much the Government have increased arts funding. The answer always comes that, since 1979-80, funding has increased by 7 per cent. or 9 per cent. in real terms. No one else understands where those figures come from. The briefing paper from the National Campaign for the Arts says that it does not understand and that that they had risen by 7 per cent. in real terms,

> "nor did he explain how he reached the figure."

I can give two explanations, one of which I have analysed at great length in the House before. It is the famous incident of the delayed payments in 1979-80 and 1980-81. There happened to be a computer strike. Several millions of pounds were earmarked but not paid until the Government took office.

My second explanation is that the Government use the gross domestic product indicator or deflator instead of the RPI. In regard to almost every form of spending except the billions that go on defence, for example, we go by the RPI, according to which there has been a drop of 1·5 per cent. in funding since the Government took office. If we include something else that the Government wiped out and have forgotten about—the Housing the arts budget—far from there being a real terms increase of 7 per cent, there has been nearly a 5 per cent. collapse in real terms. We should remember that the Arts Council is working permanently on the margin.

Mr. Jessel: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Buchan: That is a brief answer to some of the nonsense that has been put forward by the Minister, but I am quite prepared to answer any further nonsense that might come from the Conservative Back Benches.

Mr. Jessel: This will not be nonsense. It will be a very sensible question. I have listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman, who has gone on almost entirely about financing. Why does he not devote a little more of his considerable intelligence to asking whether the money that is being provided is helping to produce satisfactory artistic performances which give pleasure to those who see or hear them?

Mr. Buchan: I was dealing with some of the material that the Minister presented, but of course performance is the end point of our discussions. I should much prefer to deal with real things that matter—the end product—than the funds with which they are produced. If the hon. Gentleman does not believe that the squeeze on theatre and on music does not have its consequences in terms of artistic production, he is far adrift.

My brother writes plays, especially for the amateur theatre. He now writes them for "three male and two female" or "four male and one female" parts. That is the extent of the squeeze. I went to see the recent production of "Antony and Cleopatra" with Redgrave herself, but it was not a production which would have stood in terms of scale with the Beerbohm Trees of the past. All theatres are cutting, except the massive tourist-orientated blockbusters, such as "Chess".

The Government's response is private patronage and sponsorship. The most frightening thing that the Government have said—the Minister has repeated it often—is that any future expansion or development must come from the private sector. Will the Minister confirm that he means that there will be a standstill in the real level of public spending? That is the implication of what he has said. If that happens, we shall be in immense difficulties. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel)—mentioned one—the effect on the arts.

The Opposition accept the case for multiple sources of funding — from local authorities, Government, box offices and aspects of sponsorship. Hon. Members know that I oppose certain forms of sponsorship such as that of tobacco companies but, by and large, I am not against multiple funding. On the contrary, I believe that, although multiplicity is not a substitute for more formal methods of maintaining the freedom of the artist, it can help to retain a sense and, to a considerable extent, an actuality of such freedom. That is now being reduced by the Government's squeeze on public spending, their cuts in local authority spending and their cutting of the real value of central funding. That is making a mockery of any freedom.

When the Minister speaks of my policy as beginning to reject the arm's length of Government, he forgets that a squeeze on funding and a push towards sponsorship can have the same effect. No theatre that relies on sponsorship can afford to put on a play that offends its sponsor. We are witnessing an enforced scampering after sponsorship in a bid for survival, a quest for alternative sources of funding and the need to avoid risk and innovation to secure a box office response. That is turning arts administrators into fund raisers rather than planners, innovators and developers and it has begun to distort the content of the work that is produced. The new, the innovative and the challenging will be at risk.

There was a conference on sponsorship of the visual arts at the Tate Gallery last year at which one of the sponsors explained his multinational firm's attitude to sponsorship. His comments were revealing and bland. He said:

"We prefer to sponsor exhibitions with which we feel comfortable."

He meant the glamorous and the safe rather than the innovative, the risky and the adventurous. There is already a distortion, if not censorship, therefore. We therefore oppose the concept advanced by the Minister and the Government that sponsorship is an alternative to proper Government funding of future developments.

The problems that face the arts are easily categorised. They are underfunded. There is far too narrow a concept of what are the arts. There is a narrowness of concept about what is high culture and what is popular. There is a lack of esteem for the arts, as is exemplified by the Government's behaviour today. It is inevitably establishment-London dominated — not London-dominated. When the Arts Council produced "The Glory of the Garden", it should have realised that we are not dealing just with geographical differences and separation from the South Bank. Brixton and Hackney are just as far away from the South Bank as Warrington and Manchester. The structure of the arts organisation is elitist. There is nothing elitist about "Fidelio"—it is a marvelous revolutionary opera—but there is a great deal that is elitist in the ambience of Covent garden and in the administration of the arts.

How do we cope with that? First, the arts are underfunded. There is only one answer—there must be substantially more funding. If one looks at the state of the disrepair of our national museums and galleries, such as the National Gallery, the British museum and the Victoria and Albert museum, and if one considers that some are being forced to make admission charges to provide funding, it is clear that between £35 million and £45 million needs to be spent over the next three years to bring them into a decent state of repair. When one considers the cuts in central funding and the Arts Council over the years, it is clear that we need to double central funding, although the Minister pokes fun at that phrase. Certainly £140 million would be needed to bring some of our regional and national theatres and music organisations back into full proper use. I do not deny the need for a major injection of funds for that.

A major element of that injection will come from the restoration of local government funding. We intend to impose a statutory obligation on local authorities to provide for the arts, entertainment and museums, rather than through a mandatory rate, as sometimes the Labour party has suggested. An element for the arts and for museums should be added to the rate support grant for libraries as encouragement and support for local authorities. As a consequence of that, we shall ask each local authority to undertake a process of consultation with all interested bodies, including arts organisations, trade unions and community organisations, and with local neighbouring authorities, and to publish a plan for the development of the arts in their areas.

We have been dealing with the arts in too narrow a way. The answer to that is to bring all the arts under a single Ministry. We can no longer keep the main cultural fare of our people, broadcasting and films, separate from a Ministry of the arts. That is nonsense. Ministers for the arts or for culture in western Europe do not understand why broadcasting, films and popular arts are not brought under one Ministry in the United Kingdom. We must bring them under a unified Ministry.

Moreover, films, television, independent production, video, young people doing their own thing in studios, and popular music are a single entity, which we have come to refer to as the culture industries. We must broaden the concept of the arts. We can no longer separate some art for them and some for us. We must therefore include the popular arts.

We must recognise that the best way to restore esteem for the arts is to have a Minister in charge of arts and communications, including publications and the printed word, in the Cabinet as of right. The question of access and participation is not solved by central planning alone. I cannot understand why my policy that the major disbursement of funds should go to the regions has been attacked as centralist. That makes no sense to me. It is the opposite of centralising because it gives power to the regions, which know better than 105 Piccadilly, with the greatest of respect to it.

The Minister says that I am smashing the arm's length principle in relation to our national institutions by saying that they should be funded directly from the Ministry. First, the principle has already been dramatically weakened by the Priestley intervention, which I am not criticising, involving direct Government funding. Secondly, no Arts Council has the freedom to decide not to give funding to one or other of our national institutions. Imagine the Arts Council saying, "We have decided to abolish the National Theatre, so we are giving it no money." That is nonsense. Thirdly, the best freedom we can give to our national institutions, as to our theatres, is sufficient funding to give them the courage to put on the productions they choose, instead of forcing them to scramble for funds and sponsors.

I am not alone in my view, but backed by the all-party Education, Science and Arts Committee. I discovered only in the past 48 hours that it had come to the same conclusion as me. Recommendation 17 of the Committee's report on "Public and Private Funding of the Arts" states:

> "In conjunction with the Minister, the Arts Council should make special arrangements to administer a separate grant for the national companies as earmarked by the Minister,."

From my experience in other Departments, the correct way to deal with the arts is for major funding to go to strengthen regional arts development bodies, in place of the regional arts associations, for national institutions to be funded by the Minister, and for it to be a statutory right of the new Arts Council to discuss and negotiate with the Minister about that. That worked perfectly satisfactorily with other Departments such as Agriculture, in the old days, and is the best democratic process for the arts.

The Arts Council should not be appointed by the Minister, because that means that it plays footsy with him and becomes his instrument. It should be elected directly from the regions and the arts if it is to be a powerful, independent voice, speaking for the arts to the Minister. If that is called smashing the arm's length principle and centralising, I do not know what is not.

The present genuine crisis in the arts is a parallel to the crisis facing Britain as a whole. It is a deep basic crisis, not only of politics and economics, but of philosophy, ideas and values. We have adopted values unparalleled since the late 1930s. The whole settled good of the past half century of a commitment to social concern and community values has been replaced by a cash-based ideology, both sharper and cruder than pre-Victorian times. We cannot answer that assault on our values merely by campaigning on policy or examining section 22 of a Social Security Act. At present there is a clash of values.

We in the Labour party want to develop policy-making as an expression of the new and better society which we wish to achieve. However, if we are fully to involve the imagination and commitment of our people as a whole in the creation of a better society, we must also engage in the battle of ideas. Without that, no Government will be backed by a radical drive from the people for the sort of change that we need, and the elan that is necessary to keep us on course.

For that reason, we as Socialists have always cherished the artist. It is not because we demand of them the enforced commitment to a particular set of values, but because we recognise that artists provoke questioning, remove our blinkers, awaken compassion and fray at the nerve edge of our consciousness and awareness. Therefore, artists frequently set the agenda for which we as Socialists can provide the ultimate answers. That is why we have a common purpose with artists. Artists speak the truth as they see it and we seek to provide answers to the problems that their questioning has posed. Artists let us see more clearly the real nature of the present crisis because, above all, they deal with it as it touches the individual. Therefore, they emphasise the need for change even more clearly and sharply than the propagandists.

Mr. Bowden (Dulwich) rose——

Mr. Buchan: As we are the party for change, we are on the side of artists. We recognise with Shelley that the poet is the unacknowledged legislator of the world. We not only support the arts for the individual artist and creator, but for a further reason to do with the engagement of values.

We live in a grossly unequal world which is also unequal within the arts.

Mr. Bowden rose——

Mr. Buchan: We need to restore to our people the rich heritage of culture which has been taken from them, whether in our congested inner cities, our inadequate suburban schemes, or in our remote rural areas. New technologies will either open up possibilities of a life of enormous richness or one of defeated squalor. We must take control of our future in which the arts will play an increasingly significant role.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): If Opposition Members do not like the use of a Friday for a debate on the arts, it is open to them to use one of their Opposition days for such a debate. However, I cannot help noticing that they have not done so.

We have not done too badly over the amount of time devoted to debating and discussing the arts. Only three months ago we had a full-scale debate on business sponsorship of the arts; and I believe that questions on the arts come up about every three weeks. I believe that what the Opposition really dislike is not Friday debates on the arts, but the Conservative Government's success story in relation to the arts, and the tremendously impressive list of achievements that my right hon. Friend the Minister set out. I shall return to that later. I wish first to discuss the levy on tapes. The Government have proposed a 20p levy on blank tapes. That is absolutely right. Musicians work hard to earn their living. They are not as well off as they should be. They derive their livelihoods partly from recordings on which they receive royalties. Recordings may be put on discs or tapes. Anyone can buy a blank tape quite cheaply, borrow a record and then tape it, thus saving himself the expense of buying the recording. In that case, the musician or musicians who performed the music will not receive any royalties. That is unjust. We can begin to put things right—as the Government propose to do—by imposing a levy on tapes, and the proceeds could go towards the royalties received by professional musicians. These days, 20p is quite a small amount. It is not much more than the price of a cup of tea or coffee in a third-class cafe. It is not exactly a back-breaking sum.

Nevertheless, the manufacturers of blank tapes have mounted a massive advertising campaign against that wise, sensible and fair Government proposal. A series of full-page advertisements have recently appeared in national newspapers. Perhaps you could remind me, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, whether it is in order to quote from those newspapers?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It is.

Mr. Jessel: Thank you. That full-page advertisement in The Times says that it is issued by the "Tape Manufacturers Group." I understand that those manufacturers are all to be found abroad, and that 60 per cent. of them are Japanese. The advertisement says that it is issued by that group.

"in the interest of the tape buying public."

It continues:

"Oppose the tape levy. It is a gift to the greedy . . . if you have to cough up more money because of lobbying by greedy record companies, there must be plenty of other fat cats waiting in the wings for their extra dollop of cream. A Tape Levy is wrong on moral and legal grounds. If it is imposed during the next session of Parliament it sets a ghastly precedent for the righting of any number of imagined wrongs."

That is sheer nonsense.

It is laughable to say that a tape levy is wrong on moral grounds. As for saying that it is wrong on legal grounds, if the House, following the proper procedures, authorises a levy on tapes, it is legal. The advertising agency or public relations company who wrote that advertisement did so in ignorance of that fact. The tape manufacturers have been unwise in their choice of advertising or public relations company.

I hope that the Government will not give in, and have no truck with this advertising campaign by the tape manufacturers. I also hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts will convey our feelings to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is responsible for such issues. The Government should stick to their guns, hold firm, and proceed with the levy in the interest of live musicians. They should give further proof—if any is needed—that the Conservative party, and this Conservative Government care about the arts and want fair rewards for professional artists. If the Government hold firm, they will earn the lasting appreciation of the musical world.

The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who is sitting in the Gangway next to the former Leader of the Opposition, but who is now returning to his seat on the Opposition Front Bench, was full of doom and gloom. Characteristically he exaggerated, using words such as catastrophic, depredations, philistine, reckless, squeezing and so on. But none of that could disguise the fact that in the United Kingdom the arts are flourishing as never before. My right hon. Friend the Minister gave a tremendously impressive list of achievements. I shall not repeat it, as it will appear in the Official Report. But the hon. Member for Paisley, South clearly did not listen to my right hon. Friend. The hon. Gentleman went on to talk about abolition in a tone of gloom and doom. I recall that two years ago he mentioned a crisis in the arts. Most of that talk focused on Greater London and then, to a lesser extent, on the six metropolitan counties. None of his prophesies came true.

Mr. Buchan: The hon. Gentleman must remember that the worst did not happen because I sounded the alarm bells and helped to mobilise resistance. We won. The credit that the hon. Gentleman takes should be given to the Arts Council, the regional arts associations and the local authorities. The Ministry deserves no credit, as it underfunded by £19 million.

Mr. Jessel: It is the Government who should take the credit, because they took the decision and had to find the money to make up the difference when many competing claims were put forward in every conceivable area of the Government. Many hon. Members in all parties asked for that to be done, and the Government were right to take that decision. Of course, there had to be a period of uncertainty, because there had to be consultation. If people are to be consulted and representations are to be made, there must be a period of uncertainty before the decisions are finally taken.

During that period the hon. Gentleman asked for things to be done even though they were probably going to be done anyway. The point is that those decisions were taken.

The arts are now buoyant. That is a tremendous national asset. It is enormously important, because if the arts flourish, they can enrich and enlarge people's lives. They also give great enjoyment.

Even if one looks only at the economic aspect of the success of the arts in the United Kingdom, it is of tremendous value to the country. The live and visual arts, taken together with our national heritage of buildings and the monarchy, with which our heritage is linked, comprise our main tourist attraction, drawing overseas visitors to the United Kingdom. Foreigners come here not for our weather but to see our old towns and cities, our historic houses, churches and cathedrals, our art galleries and museums, and the royal family and everything to do with it. They come to see our theatres, concerts, opera and ballet.

As one would expect of a great capital, London is one of the arts centres of the world. Nowhere else, with the possible exception of New York, is there such a full and splendid mix of the live and visual arts, and the heritage.

Our theatre is second to none both in quality and quantity, ranging from the National Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company to theatre of all sorts. Britain is superb musically, with orchestral concerts, chamber music, instrumental and solo work. We have four great orchestras based in London. A first-class season of promenade concerts will shortly commence. We have excellent opera, ballet and dance at Covent garden, the Coliseum and Sadler's Wells. On the South Bank, the Royal Festival hall, the Queen Elizabeth hall and the Purcell room are going well. The South Bank board is doing an excellent job in its future planning.

Opposition Members' gloomy forecasts of what would happen after the abolition of the GLC have been confounded. The South Bank board is managing perfectly well without the GLC. The Barbican complex in the City is a bold, imaginative venture which owes much to the vision, courage and generosity of the Corporation of the City of London.

I know that the House will forgive me if I make special reference to an institution in my constituency, the Royal Military School of Music at Kneller hall in Twickenham. It trains the finest army bands in the world. These are one of the prides of this country. They will be seen marching on the way to the Royal wedding in four weeks' time. For the past three years I have been fighting to prevent Kneller hall, being moved from Twickenham to some unsuitable site on the coast, there to be merged with the training of the bands of the Royal Marines and the Royal Air Force. If that happens it will reduce musical standards.

I am, therefore, grateful to no fewer than 164 of my right hon. and hon. Friends for signing early-day motion No. 397. I am also grateful to my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence for each having found the time to see me on this matter. As a result, a full-scale review of the decision is being made and the costs are being re-examined. I believe that the original decision two years ago, taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) to move the Royal Military School of Music from Twickenham, was a mistake. The result of the review is expected during the summer. I trust that the Government will take into account not only the great sense of feeling in this House, as shown by 164 of my colleagues, but the strength of feeling in another place where there was a debate on a starred question in February; and the views of 18,679 people who signed petitions to keep the Royal Military School of Music permanently at Kneller hall.

I turn to another type of music school—the great academies and colleges such as the Royal College of Music, the Royal Academy of Music and the Guildhall School of Music, all in London, and the Royal Northern School of Music in Manchester. By and large, they produce performers and teachers of very high standards. Two weeks ago I was fortunate to visit the Guildhall School of Music, together with my hon. Friends the Members for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) and for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn). We toured the school and saw work of a very high standard. A violin master class was being taken by the celebrated violinist Yfrah Neaman; an examination was taking place that included a performance of Mendelssohn by a piano trio, which was technically highly difficult and which was played to a remarkable standard; and there was a rehearsal of an opera by Chabrier. All those works were being performed to a high level that made them a delight to hear.

There has recently been talk of the Royal Academy of Music being singled out to become what has been described as a centre of excellence. I should wish to hear both sides of the argument before seeing my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. So far, I have heard only one side and therefore prefer to suspend judgment. However, I know that the matter is worrying the musical world. The key question is whether sufficient improvement would be generated to justify possibly cutting the ground from under the feet of other institutions with excellent standards. Therefore, I hope that the Government will exercise caution.

In London there are excellent visual arts, with some magnificent museums. I salute the courage of the Victoria and Albert museum staff, led by its director Sir Roy Strong, on two widely different matters — first, for seeking to recreate the spirit of that great Victorian building by refurbishing it, with Government support, and secondly, on their courage in seeking to attract voluntary donations from the visiting public.

Hampton court in my constituency is a Royal palace but also serves as another great museum. It suffered from a terrible fire some 11 weeks ago, and great damage was caused. I am glad that the Government, through the Secretary of State for the Environment, have decided to provide funds so that the damage can be repaired. Ninety per cent. of the palace is now open to visitors. The number of visitors has fallen off since the fire, and perhaps the fact that it is now open again is not widely enough known. I hope that there will be a resumption of large numbers of school parties and other visitors in the near future. I am worried that the part that was damaged may take as long as four years to repair and restore. I hope that the Secretary of State will think again on this matter to find a way to effect repairs more quickly.

My right hon. Friend the Minister said that our museums must not sit on their treasures. I agree. The whole point of a work of art is for it to be perceived. It is much more important for works of art to be seen and enjoyed than to be hoarded for some academic motive to do with the integrity of the collection. The academics in museums tend to put too much weight on the second purpose, when they should put nearly all the weight on works of art being seen. There really is little point in them being stored in cellars and hardly ever seen.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will vigorously encourage those museums with more works of art than they are able to show, to lend them to other museums around the country so that they can be seen by more people. It would provide opportunities for people to see works of art in the provinces. That is being done to some extent already, but not to the sort of extent that I would wish.

Sponsorship has been mentioned by both the Labour and Liberal spokesmen. The Labour party appears to be against it, and the Liberals to denigrate it. I believe sponsorship to be tremendously important. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) produced a paper on the subject to the Council of Europe, and we debated the matter in February. It is surely of great value that sponsorship of the arts by businesses has multiplied 40-fold from £500,000 to £20 million during the past 10 years, with three-quarters of the increase being during the past seven years under a Conservative Government.

It is good and right that our great business corporations should act as patrons of the arts and thereby extend the opportunity to the general public to enjoy concerts, exhibitions and operas. That should be enthusiastically encourged by both sides of the House, not only by Conservative Members. The lukewarm attitude of Opposition Members to this important new dimension of support for the arts is pathetic—they should reconsider their attitude, and do so quickly.

10.59 am

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau, Gwent): Eager though I am to compress my remarks, I do not believe that I shall be able to do so in the 30 seconds or so before the next business. Perhaps I may advertise what is to come later by inviting those Members lucky enough to come into the Chamber now to stay for the rest of the debate. I hope that that is a proper use of this advertising moment. I appeal to all who have come in at this late hour not just to participate in questions but to hear the later debates.

I think that I have used up the time available. I would not wish to interrupt you, Mr. speaker, and I was watching carefully to ensure that I did not incommode you in any way.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

11 am

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on disciplinary action at GCHQ.

The Minister of State, Department of Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, in his statement to the House on 19 March, reported what he had told representatives of the Council of Civil Service Unions concerning the action that would be taken in respect of the few members of the staff of GCHQ who had accepted the revised conditions of service but had then gone back on their undertakings and had rejoined unions. My right hon. and learned Friend said that those staff had been asked to honour their original commitment by resigning from the unions they had rejoined and that if they failed to do so they would be subject to disciplinary procedures. I understand from the director, GCHQ, that disciplinary action has now been taken against 13 such employees of GCHQ and that letters have been sent to them informing them of the penalties that are to be imposed.

Three other members of the staff at GCHQ who have informed management that they have rejoined a national trade union will also be subject to disciplinary action in the next few weeks.

GCHQ has also warned those concerned that so long as they remain in membership of a national trade union they will be in breach of the conditions of service which apply to them in GCHQ and may be subject to further disciplinary action in accordance with the procedures and penalties prescribed in the Civil Service code. GCHQ therefore proposes to seek suitable alternative posts for them elsewhere in the home Civil Service, in which they can continue in national trade union membership if they wish. In the meantime, for so long as they remain in GCHQ, if they should become eligible for promotion their conduct will have to be taken into account, they will not be considered for an overseas posting, and they will continue to be ineligible for inclusion in the proposed restructuring.

I wish to stress to the House that we are talking here of a very small number of people. More than 99 per cent. of GCHQ staff members have accepted and comply with the revised conditions of service, morale is high, and restructuring is going ahead in consultation with the staff federation.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that the methods of informing the civil servants concerned are quite inadequate, that only five of the 13 have received the letters and that the information has been given to them indirectly, through the general secretaries of their trade unions? Is he aware that the penalties are much more severe than the Government pretend and that for the senior civil servants involved the fine imposed will be between £3,000 and £4,500? Is he further aware that they will suffer from continuing pressure to take alternative jobs in the Civil Service and from continuing threats of further disciplinary action, which will make it difficult for them to perform their duties?

Is the Minister aware that the terms of the letters sent to the five civil servants are extremely harsh? He referred to the meeting between the Foreign Secretary and the Civil Service unions on 18 March, but is he aware that the threat of continuing action amounts to reneging on the Foreign Secretary's assurance on that occasion that this would be the only piece of disciplinary action against trade union members? Is he aware that the Opposition believe that disciplinary action of this kind should not be used against civil servants on the sole ground that they are trade union members and that we find it entirely objectionable?

The Minister is aware that the whole question of trade union membership at GCHQ is before the European Court of Human Rights, which will make a judgment on the admissibility of the case later this year. Is it not wrong for the Government to pursue action of this kind while the case is still pending?

Is the Minister aware that, far from morale at GCHQ being high, as he claims, this action will damage morale still further not just at GCHQ but throughout the Civil Service, and that the reaction received by the trade unions this morning has been one of deep anger and resentment by civil servants throughout the country?

Finally, is the Minister aware that, to take action of this kind against trade union membership in the Civil Service when the whole question of human rights is very much to the fore in our consideration of South Africa, is deeply insensitive? In a democracy, trade union membership is a basic human right. By taking this action, the Government show that they have no understanding of that fact.

Mr. Renton: To answer some of the points raised by the hon. Lady, so far as I understand it all the letters to the few people involved were posted at the same time. The details of the penalties are, of course, a matter for the director and management of GCHQ. I should point out that all the employees concerned were given proper notice of the date of the boards convened to consider their behaviour and of their right, in accordance with established procedures, to attend the disciplinary board and to be accompanied, if they wished, by a friend or colleague who could have been a member of a union, but none of those charged chose to attend. It is incorrect to say that the penalties in any way constitute a reneging on what my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary said to the House on 19 March.

The European Commission of Human Rights still has to decide on the admissibility of the case, which could be a very lengthy process. So far as I am aware, there is no general practice in this or any other country for Governments to refrain from taking action pending court decisions.

Finally, I repeat that morale at GCHQ is high. The hon. Lady and her friends would do far better to put their weight behind encouraging the 99 per cent. of GCHQ staff who have accepted the new conditions of service and encouraging the staff federation.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Am I right in believing that one very simple way for the staff affected to have avoided this situation would have been not to go back on their word?

Mr. Renton: Yes, that is absolutely correct.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Is there any justification in the unions' claim that the Government action now anounced flies directly in the face of the assurances given by the Foreign Secretary just a few months ago? Secondly, does the Minister accept that, whatever the ultimate decision, if there is one, by the European Commission or the European Court, it is extremely tactless for the Government to seek yet again to interfere in GCHQ in this fashion, given that the courts have made it clear that the original Government action was unjustified?

Lastly, does the Minister understand that, even if only a small minority of people are involved, those people have civil rights? Are not the Government yet again flying not only in the face of the courts but in the face of the rights of minorities? Does the Minister accept that minorities, in trade unions or anywhere else, deserve to be protected and not bulldozed by Government? That is what we object to.

Mr. Renton: To take the last point first, I fully accept that all employees at GCHQ are individuals whose position must be very carefully examined, but so must the position of national security in which GCHQ is involved. I submit that the management of GCHQ and the Ministers involved have taken a great deal of time and patience to consider this case, particularly the position of those who originally said that they would leave their union and accepted the A option but then rejoined. A lot of patience has been exercised.

No undertaking was given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary that no further disciplinary action would be taken following the present round. As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 19 March, the A option rejoiners were asked to honour their commitment — we are talking about them today — by resigning from the unions which they had rejoined. As long as they fail to do that they are in breach of their conditions of service and must remain subject to disciplinary procedure.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Is my hon. Friend aware that many of us who are trade unionists believe that trade unionism with no guarantee against industrial action is inappropriate in establishments which are vital to the national security? As for civil rights, to which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred from the Liberal Benches, what civil rights will there be if this country is unable to defend itself against the enemies of freedom?

Mr. Renton: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. This goes to the heart of why it was considered that national union membership was unacceptable at GCHQ, in the light of the long periods of disruption there. What we have now done at GCHQ brings that communications headquarters into line with other security and intelligence agencies in France, the United States and Italy where there are similar policies of no union membership in intelligence agencies.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Does the Minister realise that his announcement is petty, vindictive, spiteful and, above all, stupid? It is stupid in that it will provoke the very industrial action that the Government say they want to avoid and will destroy the morale of which the Minister boasted this morning.

Is the Minister aware that his statement is vindictive in that, despite the assurances by the Foreign Secretary, it is clear that, in addition to the fines of up to £4,000, those involved will face a continuing campaign of punishment and persecution under this Government?

Is he aware that the statement is petty and spiteful because the Minister is trying to enforce an agreement which clearly was entered into under duress? In that context, will the Minister confirm that some of the members have tried to return the £1,000 Judas money to the management, and that GCHQ management has returned the cheques and refused to accept the money?

Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that at least he precludes dismissal and loss of job from this continuing programme of persecution?

Mr. Renton: I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said about the money being returned, and I shall check that with GCHQ management. I totally disagree that my statement is petty, vindictive and spiteful. It is the opposite. GCHQ management has shown much patience in considering how to deal with the few who have rejoined their union. It would be entirely inappropriate for disciplinary procedures not to be taken against those who remain in breach of their conditions of service. It would also let down the more than 99 per cent. who have accepted the conditions of service.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about further penalties. It is impossible to forecast whether or when further disciplinary procedures might be thought appropriate. It would be still less appropriate to say what, if any, penalties might then be imposed.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it not clear that in the case of the small number of civil servants who have been disciplined, the proper disciplinary procedures were followed meticulously? Is it not also clear that those who have already been disciplined could have avoided that disciplinary action by abiding by the terms of their contracts and that all future cases of this kind could be avoided if only those who enter into an agreement with their employer abide by that agreement?

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend is correct on all three matters. The proper procedures were followed exactly. What is more, those to whom the letters have been sent are — I stress this — to be found appropriate jobs in the home Civil Service and they can retain trade union membership. Furthermore, they could still deal with the problem and remain at GCHQ by resigning their trade union membership and accepting the conditions of service, as the vast majority of their fellow workers have already done.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Minister aware that the people of this country fought for years to establish free trade unionism and that it is the mark of Fascism to try to eliminate the right to belong to a trade union?

Is the story on the front page of today's Guardian true? Is it correct that the rejoiners have been told that incremental salary increases due to them will be docked for two years and that in most cases this will mean a loss of between £1,600 and £2,000? If the Minister manages to force out those people who wish to remain in a union and they have to go elsewhere in the home Civil Service, can he give an assurance from the Dispatch Box that they will not be victimised by this most vindictive Government?

Mr. Renton: It is a great pity that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) does not bend some of his passion and eloquence to putting his weight behind the 99 per cent. who have accepted the conditions of service and who are doing their hardest to build up GCHQ into an even more effective national security unit than it is already. The details of the penalties are for the director and management of GCHQ. I understand that in the letters those concerned have been told that they will not be entitled to either one or two increments for up to two years. I repeat that the vast majority have accepted the new terms of service, as can the handful about whom we are talking by resigning from their union membership now.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Does my hon. Friend accept that the problem highlighted today is merely an extension of the problem that arose when disruptive action put our national security at risk? Does he agree that, with the revised arrangements, people must now feel that they no longer have divided loyalty to external organisations?

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend is right. Morale is high, not least because of the restructuring which has simplified the employment structure at GCHQ, which is much welcomed because it recognises the unique contribution to national security made by the staff at GCHQ.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): On what day was the last warning given to the individuals concerned and what contact has taken place since then? What will be the last day at work at Cheltenham for those involved?

Mr. Renton: I cannot give my hon. Friend the precise details, but I can assure him that the precise procedure for such cases laid down by the Civil Service code was followed exactly. None of those involved bothered to attend the meetings to which I referred earlier.

Sheepmeat (Caesium Levels)

11.18 am

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the control on the movement or slaughter of hill sheep and other sheep.

My Ministry and the other agricultural Departments have been carrying out an extensive programme of monitoring of all foodstuffs likely to be affected as a result of the Chernobyl accident. The latest batch of results is being published today. These present a satisfactory picture overall and there is no reason for anyone to be concerned about the safety of food in the shops.

However, the monitoring of young unfinished lambs, not yet ready for market, in certain areas of Cumbria and north Wales indicates higher levels of radio-caesium than in the rest of the country. These are the areas of high rainfall during the weekend of 2 and 3 May. While these levels will diminish before the animals are marketed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have decided to use the powers in the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to make absolutely certain that when these lambs are marketed they will be below the internationally recommended action levels for radio-caesium of 1,000 bq/kg.

We have therefore made an order which we are laying before Parliament to come into effect today which will prohibit for the next 21 days the movement and slaughter of sheep within the two areas designated in south west Cumbria and parts of north Wales. This will enable us to monitor closely the sheep flock in these areas.

The areas subject to restriction will be reduced as soon as monitoring results, based on a rigorous sampling programme, confirm the expected fall in levels. Testing is also being undertaken in Scotland and Northern Ireland, where similar restrictions will be imposed if necessary.

The main season for marketing young lamb from the designated areas will not start until July. The Government recognise that these measures may cause some interference with the marketing plans of farmers in the areas concerned, but I am sure that they will appreciate that the measures taken for the protection of the consumer are in the general interest of the British sheep industry. If however it should prove to be necessary, the Government will be prepared to discuss cases of compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances to specific farmers.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I thank the Minister for making this statement. May I say to the Leader of the House that once again it appears not to have been possible to give reasonable notice to those affected of the intention to make an agriculture statement?

We recognise that the primary interest and responsibility lies in the safety and health of the consumer. We must recognise also that the areas concerned are heavily dependent on sheep. The economy and livelihood of a number of individuals, and perhaps even an entire sector of agriculture, are likely to be affected. The fact that the right hon. Gentleman has chosen, in my view entirely correctly, to make a public statement is bound to evoke some public alarm, especially in view of the complacency which has been exuded by MAFF up to the present about the affects on the food chain of the Chernobyl accident. For example, we were getting——

Sir John Biggs Davison (Epping Forest): Not complacency.

Mr. John: The hon. Gentleman, who is making sotto voce remarks—perhaps he is making his only speech of the Session—had better listen to some of the facts on agriculture before he starts interjecting.

There were press stories three weeks ago about the level of caesium and hot spots. Nevertheless, it is only now that MAFF has chosen to act. It is better that the House voices its worries than for worries to be felt and remain unanswered and, therefore, to fester.

I shall ask the Minister a number of specific questions to which I hope he will reply. First, are cattle likely to have a higher level of caesium? Can he be categorical that there has been no effect upon milk supplies? We understand that one of the ways, although a minor way, in which young, unfinished lambs contracted the infection is by grazing on grassland.

Secondly, bearing in mind that in the post-Chernobyl weeks there must have been many movements of lambs, sheep and cattle out of the areas concerned, will the Minister say whether caesium has been traced only in young lambs? Is there any danger of caesium having been contracted by sheep? There was no mention of that in a parliamentary answer that was given on 4 June. Has caesium been traced in older lambs and are they being monitored? When does the right hon. Gentleman think that the presence of caesium in older animals will become apparent, if they have contracted it?

The Minister has referred to areas in Cumbria and north Wales and has said that the order will have a duration of 21 days. A period of 28 days is allowed under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take action that will lead to parliamentary scrutiny of the order in due course.

Are the other western sheep-rearing areas being monitored and is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that at present the movement of lambs in those areas represents no danger? The right hon. Gentleman has talked about areas in north Wales and south-west Cumbria and I should like to know the overall area and the number of lambs and sheep that are affected. Is it a matter of a number of hot spots or is there general infection across the areas that he has mentioned?

The Minister has mentioned the assistance that is to be given in compensation. If necessary, I hope that action will be taken in international law to enable proper compensation to be given to those who are affected by the presence of radio-caesium in their animals, and that compensation will not be confined to domestic assistance.

What is the position on the charges that are due under the Agriculture Bill 1986? The Minister has stubbornly maintained so far that charging will take place for public health tests under the new Act. We understand that this radioactive infection of sheep and lambs may occur and continue for many years. May I have the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that no charges will be made to the affected farmers or any other worried farmers in the areas concerned for the undertaking of public health checks? Will he reconsider his attempt to make such checks chargeable under the Agriculture Bill?

Finally, it is inconceivable that the effects noted in the United Kingdom should not be present in other EEC member states or countries outside the EEC. If we are to learn something and come out of this episode somewhat wiser, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he is re-examining the restrictions on trade between any two countries to ensure that the ban on potentially affected animals is as tight as it can be? Will he undertake to make information on our experience of radioactivity in lambs as widely available as possible, so that all countries in a similar plight may benefit?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) for what he has said about his belief that it was correct to make a statement today. I think that he was wrong when he said that the statement might give rise to alarm. There is no reason for that to happen. As I said clearly in my statement, there is no reason for anyone to be concerned about the safety of food in the shops. We have taken the steps which I have outlined as a precaution, to ensure that young lambs coming on the market in future – July, August and September are the months when they are likely to come on the market – can be the subject of a proper check.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the effect on other animals. The monitoring that the Minister has been carrying out shows low levels of radio-caesium in food generally, including vegetables, dairy produce and meats other than lamb. I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. I utterly reject the hon. Gentleman's remarks about complacency on the part of the Ministry.

I believe that we have been in the forefront of all European countries in testing meat, and especially young animals. It is that testing which has come up with these results, which have caused us to take precautionary steps about future supplies. The order will last for 21 days, and I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about the need for parliamentary scrutiny. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is present and he, too, has heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

We shall continue to monitor other areas as well as those to which I have referred. We are continuing with sampling and work is continuing through the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, which has undertaken most helpful work in allowing us to identify the areas concerned. Rather than attempting to explain in detail the exact area that the orders will cover, I shall deposit in the Library today maps of the two areas concerned so that Members are able to see for themselves.

The hon. Gentleman referred to ADAS charging. I assure him that, during the running of the order which I am laying today, no new steps will be taken to introduce any new arrangements for ADAS charging.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the cautious but sensible measures he announced this morning will be widely perceived by the public as having achieved the right balance between over-reaction and under-reaction? Will the Government continue to take all measures appropriate to reassure the public?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. We shall continue to monitor the position in terms of the rigorous monitoring programme that I mentioned earlier. I am sure that my hon. Friend is right when he says that we have set the right balance between realism and prudence. We intend to do that. I think that the public will understand that there is no reason for anyone to be concerned about the safety of food in the shops.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I welcome the Minister's decision to make a statement today. I believe that the steps he announced were prudent and wise. They are a means of ensuring that caesium does not come on to the market from young unfinished lambs. There is a general assurance in the Minister's speech that the position overall is satisfactory. However, the Minister said that in Scotland and Northern Ireland specifically there is a possibility of imposing similar restrictions, if necessary. To avoid any doubt, can the Minister say that the satisfactory position covers Scotland and Northern Ireland? I believe that the rainfall was heavier in those areas.

Mr. Jopling: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman, in the course of a short question, said that I was prudent and wise. It is rather unusual to hear such kind words from him. I am most obliged to him. As I have said, the overall position is satisfactory. Testing is being undertaken in Scotland and Northern Ireland. I know that my right hon. Friends will make similar restrictions if they feel that that is necessary.

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): Generally, I welcome the measures announced by the Minister. I raise three or four small points. First, is the caesium concentrated in specific organs in the bodies of lambs? Secondly, will kids and goats be included in the restricted orders, since they were born at about the same time as the young unfinished lambs, and, presumably, were faced with the same intake of enriched rain? Thirdly, what is the position regarding compensation to the owners of abattoirs and markets and hauliers whose livelihood will be severely affected? It is not just farmers who will be affected. Fourthly, what is the position over fallen stock? Can the Minister assure the House and the country that fallen stock meat from those bodies does not enter the animal food chain in the form of meat for dogs, cats, and so on? What happens to the meat from animals in the field which die while the order is in operation?

Mr. Jopling: We have found that the radio-caesium is spread evenly throughout the muscular tissue, which is the carcase of the animal. It is not concentrated in parts of the carcase. I shall consider the question regarding kids and goats. I am not aware of any problem regarding goats. The order which we are laying today refers only to sheepmeat. I have heard what the hon. Gentleman has said about compensation for people other than farmers. I can only repeat that, if it should prove to be necessary, the Government will be prepared to discuss cases for compensation for severe loss in particular circumstances to specific farmers.

The hon. Gentleman referred to fallen stock. If the animal has died, as he suggested at the end of his question, that is one thing. Under the regulations there is no question of meat from animals which have died coming into the human food chain. The slaughter of animals will be permitted for welfare reasons. That is already provided for in the order, on condition that the meat does not go for human consumption or feeding stuffs.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Can the Minister guarantee that the irradiation concerned results exclusively from the Chernobyl incident? Is there any connection between the areas concerned and the nearby locations of nuclear installations in this country?

Mr. Jopling: I thought that a Member [illegible] as the hon. Gentleman would not have missed the opportunity to make that point. I make it clear that we are dealing with two caesium isotopes—caesium-134 and 137. The ratio between those two isotopes which are found in lambs are characteristic of the Chernobyl fallout. I am glad to be able to tell the hon. Gentleman that it is not characteristic of anything to do with Sellafield.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Minister aware that when he turns up during the middle of an arts debate mob-handed and tells us all not to panic, it will be a little difficult not to feel concerned, especially as he made this statement on a Friday when people will be out purchasing meat for the weekend? Perhaps he should have waited until Monday before he made the statement. That would have been more convenient for those hon. Members who wish to discuss the arts. An article which appears in today's Guardian states that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is understood to be postponing publication of the latest radiation readings from monitoring stations all over Britain. If that article is true, why is that so? Perhaps the Minister should give the people of this country some advice over the weekend that if they intend to eat any hill sheep they should add some iodine to the mint sauce.

Mr. Jopling: The reputation which the hon. Gentleman has achieved since he became a Member of Parliament is entirely in keeping with such foolish remarks. If the hon. Gentleman would care to listen—clearly he has not been listening—[Interruption.] I know that he would have been one of the first to be critical if we had waited until Monday and had not come forward as soon as we believed it was right to take such steps.

Action is being taken as soon as it became apparent that there was a risk of meat above the action level reaching the market in the near future. We shall be able to prevent that. I am sure that all Members would agree—the hon. Member for Pontypridd said so—that it was right to come forward today. The hon. Gentleman referred to an article in the Guardian newspaper. That is why I accused him of not listening. If he had been listening, he would have heard that I said in my statement—that the latest batch of results will be published today.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): It is right that the Minister should have made this statement. However, some aspects of the statement pose more questions than they answer. The Minister said that the order would prohibit, for the next 21 days, the movement and slaughter of sheep within the two areas designated. Can we take it that that includes the movement of sheep in and out of the designated areas? That is an important point of detail that he should cover. As a Scottish Member, I am bound to say that the statement will arouse considerable concern and uncertainty among sheep farmers north of the border. Can we expect a statement from the Scottish Office on this subject? We all know that, at the same time as radioactive rain was falling on Cumberland and north Wales, there was heavy rainfalls in Scotland.

What arrangements are the Government making to compensate farmers and other producers for the direct effect of these restrictions and for the disposal of carcases, where necessary? What compensation will there be for the inevitable disruption of the market which is likely to flow from the alarm that will inevitably be felt, whether the Minister likes it or not? I trust that the long-term costs of monitoring agricultural produce will be carried by the Government, not by the farmers, in the severe cases to which the right hon. Gentleman referred and in others.

Is it not emerging that the Government should have given advice to farmers to bring livestock in milk—both sheep and cattle—indoors while the radioactive rain was falling? That action was taken in Denmark, the Netherlands and other European countries. Why on earth has it taken so long for that information to get through in this country? If lambs have excessive levels of caesium, what assurances do we have that calves and, indeed, humans have not picked up larger amounts than they should have?

Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in appealing to the Secretary of State for Scotland to think again before commissioning another nuclear site at Torness in my constituency?

Mr. Jopling: There will not be market restrictions on sheep brought from out of the area for sale in the area. Markets in the affected area which are no longer allowed to market sheep that emanate from within the restricted area will be able to bring in sheep for sale from outside that area.

The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say that testing is proceeding in Scotland and Northern Ireland. The Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland will not hesitate to impose similar restrictions, if they feel that that is necessary in the light of emerging monitoring.

As I said earlier, the Government will be prepared to discuss compensation.

The hon. Gentleman asked about animals being brought indoors during the period when the Chernobyl cloud was moving over the United Kingdom, and I suppose that I should not have expected anything else from an eastern counties arable farmer. I point out that it would have been totally impractical on the mountains and hills of the Lake District and the Snowdonia range to house sheep indoors during that period. Those facilities did not exist.

I realise that the hon. Gentleman threw in the point about Torness at the last minute. I hope that he will refer that question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment whose responsibility it is.

Mr. John: On a small point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think not.

The Arts

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

11.43 am

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As I listened to the earlier debate on the arts, I was encouraged to believe that it would be a good day for this country when my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) takes over the task of the Minister for the Arts. I am sure that he will, with his natural eloquence, bring good policy into practice and, with his great determination, raise this matter to the level it deserves. I do not say that to disparage in any way the present Minister for the Arts. He must face an extremely difficult task in trying to sustain civilised standards in this Government. The right hon. Gentleman does his best.

However, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South and I criticise the level of support that the Government give and their general approach to the arts. I think that I quote the Minister correctly when I say that he claimed that the Government were keeping up support for the arts. That is not satisfactory, especially in view of our present critical social circumstances, which were described by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South. At a time of heavy unemployment, when society is under great stress in other respects, the money, resources and intelligent effort devoted to providing for the arts all over Britain should be greatly increased. That is the test that should be applied to the Government. It is applied by some of those who are trying to grapple with our problems.

For the past 10 or more years, there has been a considerable increase in the communities in Wales who support the arts. Of course, the choirs are one of the most notable signs of culture there. The great revival in those areas is due partly to the determination of the communities —all the resources have come from them to recognise that, when faced with this crisis, there must be a great expansion of the arts. That is one way to deal with the problem. Individuals and communities such as mine in Wales are seeking to do that. We do not get anything like the support from the Government that we should have.

I recall the attitude of the previous Labour Governments to the arts. Yesterday, I read an ignorant article in The Times by Mr. Bernard Levin on this subject. Of course, I do not pay for The Times—I read a copy when I come here. Until the Wapping dispute is over, I do not propose to pay any money for it, and I am even less likely to do so having read Mr. Bernard Levin's article. He wrote as though the Labour party were opposed to the development of the arts. Everyone knows what Labour Ministers for the arts have done. Jennie Lee, especially, set new standards for Ministers for the arts. She was not called "Minister for the Arts", but she did that job. She did a splendid job and played a leading role in introducing the Open university. That system was set up when there was fierce competition for resources and the Department of Education and Science and the department with responsibility for the arts were faced with the strain of choosing priorities. Jennie Lee was one of those who insisted on the choice being made by Cabinet. She took the case to Cabinet.

I am proud when I see on the walls of the cottages of mineworkers, steelworkers or others of my constituents certificates from the Open university. Those people have been able to profit from the Labour Government's decision to go ahead with the Open university, despite all the attacks by those against it and the attempts to prevent money from being supplied to it. They ensured that it went ahead on the basis of applying the highest academic standards. I think that everyone recognises that, although I point out that the Government still restrict the amount of money available. The Government should increase the resources available instead of restricting the numbers of people who can make use of a full university education, some of whom might not have been able to take advantage of such education earlier.

One of the most disagreeable features, to put it mildly, of these restrictions is that they are often imposed by people who have had a good university education. Apparently, they are prepared to restrict the opportunities offered to other people. There were elements in the Department of Education and Science who wanted to resist the Open university because they said that there were other priorities. The Open university has now become the biggest university in the land. It is catering for wider and different sections of the community than ever before. That was done at a time of financial crisis and it shows what can be achieved under a Government with the will and imagination necessary to carry such matters further.

I am glad to hear the support that the Government are giving to libraries. However, much more ought to be done. Many of the provincial libraries are having the greatest difficulty in sustaining their service to the community because of the general restraints and cuts that the Government have imposed on the rate support grant. Individual libraries, such as the Fawcett library, are in danger of closing. I know that that is not the Minister's immediate responsibility, but he should be using his influence to try to ensure that resources are provided for that library. The same applies to the museum of labour history and other such institutions. There are many areas where, if the Government had the energy and imagination required, great assistance could be given to ensure that many varied institutions, at a time of social crisis, get the support they deserve. I hope that the Government will not be complacent. I hope that it will not be too far ahead when my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will be able to take his proper place in the next Labour Government and place the service of the arts in the proper perspective that it should hold in a civilised nation. That is what we want to see.

I wish to refer to one specific matter on which I hope that the Government will give us the backing that I believe they could. It is a matter that I have taken up with the Minister before, but I shall emphasise it again now not just in the interests of the body—the Byron society, of which I am a member—but in the interests of the nation as a whole. The duocentenary of Byron's birth will take place in 1988. It will be a big occasion throughout this country. There will be big celebrations at Cambridge university, where Byron went, much against his will. He would have preferred to go to Oxford, he made that quite clear. There will be celebrations at Newstead and throughout the rest of the country.

It is by no means certain that what we do in this country will not be surpassed by what may happen in many other countries. So great was Byron's fame, so wide his influence and so important the place he holds in the literature of our country and in world literature, that there will be similar celebrations in Greece, Italy, the United States and many other places. There are now nearly 30 Byron societies throughout the world. Recently a society was formed in China and some other parts of the world and it provides a great service to the country as a whole. I hope that the Government will approach this matter in a properly imaginative spirit.

There has been a transformation in Byron's reputation over the past 50 or 60 years. If anybody doubts what I say, they have only to look back at the controversy in 1924 when the last major Byron centenary was arranged, 100 years after his death. At that time there had been so much defamation of his character that it was almost allowed to denigrate his poety, works and achievements. We did not have a Byron society in those days, but those who had gathered to try to present the matter properly to the nation and the world, found they were facing a defensive battle and that they had to present great arguments to protect Byron from the assaults from so many quarters, even 100 years after his death. That protection succeeded and in the past 60 years his reputation has been transformed.

It would be churlish for us in this country to deny the contribution that has been made by those in other countries, especially the Americans. The American scholarship has made great contributions to try to ensure that Byronic literature should be properly represented to the world. Over the past 10 years we have had a magnificent production of Byron's letters by Professor Leslie Marchand — published, naturally, by John Murray. That has now been matched by an almost equally magnificent production of Byron's poetry by Professor McGann, published by Oxford University. Byron is coming home to his first love of Oxford at last and that is a great development.

We certainly acknowledge the worldwide interests, especially the interest of American scholarship. However, we must take account of what has been achieved and contributed in this country.

Among the people at the meeting in 1924, to which I referred, when a few people got together to say that they were determined to protect Byron's reputation from the assaults that were made upon it, was a young and beautiful woman who for almost the first time came to hear about the name of Byron. She later applied her particular aptitude to writing about Byron. I think that everyone who has studied the matter will agree that she has probably written about Byron with greater Byronic wit and imagination than anyone else. I am glad to say that she is still with us. I went to see Doris Langley Moore the other day. Her biographical works, as I have said, have matched any that have come from across the Atlantic and exceeded them in wit and understanding. I am glad to say that she is still alive and radiant and I trust that she will play a prominent part in the celebrations of 1988, just as I hope that the Government will make special efforts to ensure that the occasion is celebrated in a proper spirit.

The best that the Government could do to celebrate the occasion — it does not exclude all the other things — would be to respond to the appeals which have come afresh from the Greek Government for the restoration of the Parthenon marbles to the people and the land of Greece. I know that there have been plenty of arguments about that. I am not asking the Minister to reply now. In fact, I hope that he will not, because I daresay he will give us the old official reply he has trotted out before, and we do not want that. I know that there has been plenty of argument among people who do know the facts. I am not necessarily including the Minister in that respect.

For example, one of the most respected Presidents of the Byron society, William St. Clair, who has written probably the wittiest and most graceful book on the subject, appears to come down against the proposition of the return of the marbles. That does not make the argument conclusive, by any means. There are a whole range of arguments on the other side, especially those advanced by Byron himself. Anyone who reads what Byron wrote could see that he was discussing not only what should happen and why he protested so strongly against the spoliation of the Parthenon, which caused a sense of outrage among Greeks at the time, or about what was happening to Greek heritage – they have as much right to cherish their heritage as we have to cherish ours — but was expressing his sense of ourtrage when he saw great nations trying to trample on the rights of small ones.

Therefore, the great poetry that Byron wrote on that subject was directed not only to what was to happen to the Parthenon marbles, but to the way in which the world was going, and what was to be the reputation of our country in this age and time. One of the things that we shall celebrate in 1988 is the spirit in which Byron looked forward to the ensuing century and more, and foresaw a different role for our country from the one that we were performing at that time. He looked forward to an age when our country would be speaking in the name of freedom, not in the name of an imperial power. He looked forward to the time when we would be able to show our common heritage with all those other countries. It is partly because Byron expressed that almost more successfully and brilliantly than any other of our poets that he commands that worldwide allegiance.

Therefore, I say to the Government: let them not reply to what I am proposing today. Let them consider it carefully, because when the deed is done, the Government who take the final step of restoring the Parthenon marbles to where they belong will be acclaimed for their magnanimity. It would be a good thing for this Government if they did it. However, I am glad to know that, when my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South takes up his position, and when my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) takes his position as Prime Minister, we shall carry out that act of magnanimity. That at least should be some incentive to the Minister and the Cabinet, which I know he has such difficulty in converting to any wise courses on those great matters.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I hope that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) will forgive me if I do not follow him too far in his Byronic interlude. As usual, the House listened to him with interest. His eloquence is seductive. As usual, I find that I have to check one or two of the omissions in remarks which, otherwise, are agreeable. The right hon. Gentleman was a little mischievous in trying to divide the loyalties of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) with regard to his educational background and his constituency interest. However, I know that my hon. Friend will look after himself.

The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the Elgin marbles. I was fascinated by the unholy alliance between himself and Melina Mercouri. Perhaps on another occasion he will tell us more of that. He also touched on the history of the Open university, but he was a little partial in not referring to the role played by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in saving it from an early death.

I declare my interest as a parliamentary adviser to the Society of West End Theatre. I should like to talk about the live theatre, particularly the commercial part of theatre. Because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall not rehearse the arguments and, indeed, the whole ethos that has given us such splendid live theatre. The figures are well known. My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the scale of theatre going and its role in the tourist industry.

I pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister, because the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) said, entirely fairly, that there is a problem with the arts because it affects so many Government Departments. However, my right hon. Friend has been playing an especially valuable part in trying to co-ordinate efforts on the arts. I hope that I can encourage him to continue to do so in specific areas. I shall refer to other Departments in a moment.

The Minister's part was evident in the transitional arrangements after the abolition of the Greater London council. Again, my right hon. Friend played a signal role in obtaining tax relief for charities, the result of which we saw in the Budget. My right hon. Friend has said that he regards himself as a sponsoring Minister for theatre. I shall return to that matter.

The problems that face commercial theatre can be summed up simply. They are, that it is essentially a high-risk business. Only one in five productions is a major commercial success. Fortunately, there are those who wish to help the theatre, who are popularly referred to as angels. Although, naturally, they would like to see some return on their investment, often they are prepared to take a risk because of the personal association that their backing gives them with the theatre and because of their willingness to see cultural activity that may work on the margin. However, those people need more support, and the theatre itself requires that such people should be encouraged.

The Department of Trade and Industry has a key role to play in the future of our west end theatre and, indeed, in live theatre as a whole. For example, a problem might come up unexpectedly, such as the frequency for radio microphones. Perhaps it will be known to many hon. Members that no major musical production is put on these days without the use of a radio microphone, the frequency of which has to be related to the whole frequency spectrum, taking into account every other radio broadcast. In the recent allocations of frequencies, we have run into problems. If those problems are not resolved, in a production of grand opera or a major musical, there would be a real danger of the leading singer suddenly being interrupted by a message from Joe's Taxis. That problem is serious. I am glad to say that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), and his officials are showing a good deal of commendable urgency in considering the matter. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts is keeping an eye on it, too.

There is one major problem in which the Department of Trade and Industry has a particular role to play, where urgency is needed, and that is on overcharging for tickets. This country, particularly London, has a great reputation of value for money in live theatre. That reputation is suffering due to the activities of an unfortunate minority who have been exploiting the system. The figures, which have been published, are well known.

It affects shows such as "Cats", "Les Misérables", and "Starlight Express" where three times the going rate is the norm according to scalpers' prices. Just the other day, two tickets at £6·50 were sold for £80. Such exploitation is not good for theatre. It is not good enough for our reputation as a tourist centre, and for broadening the habit of theatregoing among the population. It is a manifestation of an Arthur Daley society rather than the best aspects of the Society of West End Theatre that I should like to see. What I find hard is that the society tends to bear the brunt, along with tourist authorities, for complaints.

What can be done to resolve that problem? Several things could be done. I shall not repeat the difficulties that there have been over registering agreements. There was a time, until a few years ago, when registered agreements among theatre owners would have allowed agreements on theatre ticket prices to apply. I can see the argument about opening up competition in other areas, but I am concerned about the side effects and casualties, as in this case.

The most useful way in which the problem could be tackled would be if the Government could bring forward, as a matter of urgency, the Bill on consumer goods and services, on which consultation is now taking place. That legislation is likely to include a proposed code of practice, which will contain an obligation to publish the commission element. If that were done, it would meet the recommendation of the Society of West End Theatre that at all times the full face value and the amount of commission that has been charged should be shown on the ticket.

I hope very much that my right hon. Friend the Minister will feel able to add his voice to the deliberations in the Department of Trade and Industry. I think that he will be aware, as he represents a south coast constituency next to mine, that the tourist industry is a fragile flower, and if the reputation of overcharging becomes part of the disincentive to come to this country, the effects could extend further than live theatre.

I welcome the tax relief for charities announced in the Budget, although it will do little for the theatre because of the nature of charities. I wish to consider ways of assisting the commercial theatre, given the high element of risk that is involved in its work. Hon. Members have mentioned value added tax. The Minister will know that there is a belief that the movement towards standardisation in the EEC may lead to change. I hope that he will add his voice to those which say that if we move in the direction of assistance for the arts, it should be in the form of exemptions rather than zero-rating. We must be consistent. Communications must not be seen as subject to indirect taxation.

As for the tax incentives to the angels — who are sometimes called casual investors, although I prefer the term occasional investors, because it is not a casual process but a high-risk activity — we could return to the pre-1972 position by which tax relief on losses could be offset against other income or capital gains. I recall that there were problems and that people were said to be living on farms which became their country houses. It is not beyond the wit of man I have already urged this on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to create exemptions which could be related to centres of excellence and to employment. That is certainly the case with the theatre.

More specifically, the Department of Trade ad Industry could consider the implications of legislation affecting limited partnerships. Much of the law governing them is old and relates to the Limited Parterships Act 1907. That limits the number of partners in an enterprise to 20. Section 12 of the Companies Act 1967 contains exemptions to that rule. It is clear to hon. Members that that number is not large enough for theatrical enterprises. One is talking about a band of angels, 100-strong or more. I hope that the Minister can be persuaded to use the powers available in the Act and I hope that he will help in the process of reform.

Only one theatrical production has been financed through the business expansion scheme, so it is a bit early to judge its effectiveness. However, the five-year restriction on tied investment must be seen as a deterrent to theatrical investment. If the scheme is to be reviewed, that matter could be considered.

I have stressed the problems of theatre having to deal with several Departments, and I praise my right hon. Friend the Minister for his role in trying to improve co-ordination. In the recent changes, including the abolition of the GLC, many of us have been worried about the problem of consistency. Even now, it is said that local authorities may wish to take over the activities of the Health and Safety Executive. If that is to be the case, there could be different interpretations of the rules applying to theatres throughout the country. I hope that that might be regarded as no more than a proposal which will be subject to representations, especially for activities which need an overall approach that could be effectively monitored by my right hon. Friend.

If my right hon. Friend has a chance to reply to the debate, will he undertake to examine his Department's ability to make known its views to the Department of Employment before any change is agreed?

Before my right hon. Friend took office, the Society of West End Theatre had been told by the Office of Fair Trading that it could not trace a sponsoring Department for it. At that stage, anyone interested in live theatre was worried about whether they would ever have a proper dialogue with the Government. Of course, a distinction was drawn with the publicly funded sector of the theatre, which had a link with the Arts Council. But that sector has many problems similar to those in the commercial theatre, and it does not rely solely on state funding. It must look to markets for the resolution of many of the problems that I mentioned. But there was a hiatus in the commercial theatre—the area that touches most upon the lives of the majority of our citizens and visitors. My right hon. Friend has stepped into that hiatus. He said that he was in charge of a Department that had a sponsoring role. We are grateful for that, and for his action on transitional problems. I hope that he will not take it amiss—he has broad shoulders—when I say that much remains to be done in other Departments. I count on him to use his influence to carry them forward in the right direction.

Mr. Jim Callaghan (Heywood and Middleton): The last time that I spoke in a major debate on the arts I mentioned a wide range of subjects. Today, I shall concentrate on a narrow area that is vital to the British people.

In the early 1970s, the experiment of charging entrance fees for art galleries and museums proved to be unpopular and an economic disaster. In 1974, the then Minister for the Arts, Hugh Jenkins, abolished the fees. He was supported in debates on the charges by the right hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas), who subsequently became Minister with responsibility for the arts. The right hon. Member for Chelmsford believed that legislation should be introduced to prevent the reimposition of admission charges for art galleries and museums. However, today, there are fears that the charges will be reimposed.

It has been denied that the changes in the Government's methods of funding are in preparation for charging admission fees at museums and art galleries. On 11 February this year, The Times said:

"Financial incentives have been announced to encourage national museums and art galleries to charge entry fees."

How have the proposed changes in funding art galleries and museumns given rise to such fears?

The Government have latched on to a recommendation in a report from the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts as a way of making up the shortfalls in running costs imposed by the Government's restrictions on public spending. Hence the encouragement of voluntary admission charges for art galleries and museums. The Select Committee's eighth report of 1981-82, entitled, "Public and Private Funding of the Arts", recommended:

"The 're-vote' procedure for national museums and galleries should be abolished and where they engage in successful trading they should have the right to retain their profits."

No one could disagree with that. The report also recommended that museums and galleries should be encouraged to expand all available sources of income. Again, no one could object to that.

The Government's response in Comnd. 9127 seemed to agree with "the need to provide incentives to maximise earnings."

Ay, there's the rub. On 26 July 1985, the then Minister for the Arts, Lord Gowrie, said:

"The Government intend to change this system to provide greater incentives for the national museums and galleries both to maximise their receipts (whether by the operations of their Vote-financed trading activities such as shops, by charging for admission where appropriate, or in other ways) and to use these more effectively. This also should improve the institutions' ability to respond flexibility to the needs of their visitors, in hours of opening and other matters . . . These changes should markedly improve the ability of the institutions to help themselves."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 26 July 1985; Vol. 466, c. 1541-2.]

All that I can say to that is that Sam Smiles is never dead.

On 10 February 1986, the Government proposed that the present net grants should be grants in aid, the main aim being to provide a tangible incentive to earn revenue, the change taking effect from the 1986-87 financial year. For each institution, it is proposed that there will be a single grant in aid which covers its purchases and its running costs.

To give the institutions a stable basis for their forward planning, the Government do not intend to make any further changes in the arrangements for at least the first three years of the grant in aid system.

I have tried to outline the financial background to the proposals which have led to fears about the imposition of charges at museums and art galleries. The Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts sought the opinions of distinguished directors of major galleries on the new financial proposals in written and oral evidence. I am a member of that Committee and I took part in discussions with four major directors. I should like to support what Sir Roy Strong said in a letter to the Committee on 24 April:

"our primary concern about the change to grant-in-aid is that the system will be used as a means of reducing government support to the institutions. The Government has given a commitment that, for at least three years, the level of grant will be unaffected by the level of receipts. In real terms, Government support is already reducing - the planning figure (2½ per cent. increase) for the next two years will not keep pace with inflation and does not include a realistic allowance for pay increases outside our control. We fear that our increasing earnings will provide the opportunity for Government funds to be diverted elsewhere. The fact is that current and past funding has been totally inadequate and we shall need every penny of our increased earnings in order for us to achieve the level of performance, efficiency and service to the public which is our aim."

When giving evidence to the Select Committee, Sir Roy said:

"Over the last five or seven years the funding of the V & A and the other national collections has been at an increase which is a figure which Government says inflation is and then there is a pay settlement for the Civil Service which is almost always in excess of that. At the moment we have a 2·9 per cent. increase for 1986-87 but it looks as though there will be a 6 per cent. pay settlement for the Civil Service. That has happened every year for five or seven years. No extra money has been given, whereas in the old days there . . . 'We therefore saw and still see no advantages for us in the Minister's proposal for change, and I believe a majority of the institutions affected shared our view.' Do the other members of the panel share that same view?"

We also heard from Dr. Cossons, another famous director, on 24 April. He agreed with Sir Roy Strong and said:

"We therefore find ourselves in the situation where the increase in the level of basic funding is so far below the level of pay settlements and inflation that it is leading to a state of serious reduction in real terms in the level of museum funding from the Treasury. The implication of this for museums is very serious."

I asked him to expand on that statement and he replied:

"Yes, I think Sir Roy has probably said everything I could say. The national museums are the victims of a system which is a cash limit system in which our grant is related to a predicted inflation rate, and when the salary and wage award is substantially larger than that - - and we are all highly labour-intensive organisations - - a large part of our budget goes on people. The amount which those people then have to spend to do the job which they are employed to do is seriously diminished so we reduce the staff numbers or both, but the net effect is one of reducing what we can do for our collections and for our public. It was precisely that pressure that propelled the trustees of the National Maritime Museum, on my recommendation, to go for a plural funding approach with admission charges in April 1984 - - I was Director of the National Maritime Museum until nine weeks ago. The Science Museum has no plans at present to charge admission but it is, nevertheless, faced by exactly the same problem and we have to address that issue within the next six months."

I am convinced that, in all this, there has been completely inadequate funding for our national museums and art galleries. I was appalled some years ago when, during a visit to one of our national museums, there was a thunderstorm and I saw staff running around putting down bowls and buckets to catch the rain water. On making inquiries, I discovered that Government funding for repairing that ancient building was totally inadequate. We had a silly system. The Department of the Environment gave a grant of £1 million for repairs, but the Treasury charged 15 per cent. VAT on those repairs. I suspect that we shall never plug the leaks.

I raised the matter on the Floor of the House at the time. The present Minister said recently in Committee that the Government had gone some way to improve the system by providing more money for repairs. I hope that he will be able to mention that today. The proposed method of funding our museums and galleries is, I believe, merely a back-door method of introducing admission charges to help with the running of our national institutions. If that is so - I invite the Minister to say whether it is or not - it will have a devastating effect on those in our society who cannot afford to pay admission prices - old-age pensioners, the young, the unemployed and the extremely poor.

I hope that the Minister is not about to put the clock back to the 1970s by sending out a message to our citizens that we get what we pay for - the age-old prerogative of the harlot throughout history.

12.29 pm

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): In recent years much has been written and spoken of the significance of increasing leisure time. I should like to contribute to that in terms of the value of the arts during this debate.

From the outset, and despite the ritual carping of the Opposition, it should be recognised and appreciated that the Government have fulfilled the two major strands of their arts policy: to keep up the level of state support and create the conditions in which the arts can develop by attracting additional funds from other sources, and to safeguard Britain's heritage. In the light of the economic difficulties inherited from the Opposition parties that is no mean achievement in more ways than one. The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) criticises the picture painted by my right hon. Friend the Minister, but the Government's picture has its provenance and the Opposition's painting is a fake.

The role of the arts in the tourist industry has already received wide analysis and by now should be self-evident. What has apparently received only narrow analysis is the role of the arts vis-a-vis the developing lifestyle of Britons. Clearly, in the short term, with the unfortunate rise in unemployment, more free time has been available to some people. But perhaps of more long-term significance is the positive choice that is being made between work and leisure, and between increased income and increased time off.

Already more people go to the theatre than attend football matches. Indeed, to put that in perspective, more than 40 million people a year attend our museums and galleries. This changing pattern of life needs to be reflected in Government policy decisions and in the actions taken by private enterprise. A good example of such forward thinking is to be seen in the London docklands, where the regeneration of that derelict area seeks a balance between the needs of work and play and those of commercial and residential use.

[Mr. Christopher Murphy]

It is neither sufficient simply to recognise the new importance that has been attached to the arts, nor to expect that the Government should be left to provide the necessary funds. Obviously, there is a role for the Treasury Bench in national funding and fiscal incentives, but there is an even greater role for the arts to increase their income through marketing and self-development. I urge them, as my right hon. friend has done, to step up their efforts in those directions.

While such attention is being devoted to the future it is especially welcome that great value has been placed on our past, because our heritage is strongly bound to the arts. In that context, it should be recalled that at the end of last year the Government acceded to the convention for the protection of the architectural heritage of Europe under the auspices of the Council of Europe. Such a commitment for caring for the past, as further evidenced by a budget of nearly £100 million, will provide valuable opportunities for the arts of the future. Enjoyment of the heritage has become a major pastime of many families and of our foreign visitors.

The logical connections between the arts and the heritage, and between them and the growth of leisure are fully comprehensible, but the schizophrenic attitude towards charging is wholly incomprehensible. I fear I must disagree with some of the views expressed by the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan). The public expect to pay to visit a stately home, but not a public museum. Why not? The public expect to pay to attend a theatre or concert hall, but not to pay to visit a public gallery. Again, why not? Voluntary contributions are already pointing the way, especially after the signpost erected firmly by Sir Roy Strong at the Victoria and Albert museum.

Mr. Jim Callaghan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but he has just mentioned me by name. He asked why we should not charge for entrance to museums. In my speech I pointed out that charges would affect the poorer sections of our community. However, the Institution of Professional Civil Servants has recently done some research on the charges made at the Victoria and Albert museum. It says:

"Thousands of people have been put off visiting one of Britain's cultural meccas . . . In December 1985, just 66,692 visitors came, compared with 128,005 in December 1984. The November figure was 27,049 down on the same month the previous year. This makes a nonesense of the museum's aim to raise £500,000 through charging from 1,700,000 visitors". Charging is just nonsense.

Mr. Murphy: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says, but he must recognise that the contributions made at the Victoria and Albert museum are voluntary. I sought to stress the value of voluntary contributions and the lead to museum and gallery charges by Sir Roy Strong and the Victoria and Albert museum.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: Is it possible that the picketing outside the Victoria and Albert museum by civil servants and curatorial staff from neighbouring museums did more to put off visitors than voluntary contributions?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend makes a very valid point. It is probably far too early to draw many conclusions about the consequences of contributing at the Victoria and Albert museum. But I believe that economic reality tells us that if I emphasise "if" the institution is allowed to keep the finance that it gains through charging, that should be encouraged and will produce beneficial results. Indeed, I think that the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton may agree with me on that. With the necessary safeguards for students and the elderly, and perhaps a free day as is often found on the continent, let us gain the revenue from people enjoying their leisure, and that will include a great number of tourists from overseas. Such gain would enhance our arts and heritage, as the growth in private museums and private galleries that charge has emphatically shown.

Mr. Tony Banks: Could it not be that the British tourist industry is strong partly because people are attracted to Britain by our free museums and art galleries? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should put that factor into the equation. Moreover, those of us who live in London already pay rates and taxes, so why should we also have to pay admission charges?

Mr. Murphy: One of the great attractions for overseas tourists is the arts and heritage to be found in the United Kingdom. Moreover, I believe that tourists would still want to come to Britain even if they were expected to pay, just as they pay in many other European countries which also have a great arts and heritage to offer to both tourists and their own people. The Government are extremely keen to cut the amount of taxation. Those who wish to contribute further towards the arts and the heritage should have the opportunity to do so through admission charges. Even if the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) does not agree with me, I hope that he will feel that I have answered his points.

As the arts, and with them, the heritage become associated more and more with the leisure activities of the many rather than the personal pursuit of the few, the partnership between the public and private sectors must become more and more realistic, to the benefit of us all.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This is our second full day's debate in 1986 on the arts, and I wish that we were discussing either some proposal from the Government, the Arts Council's budget or its allocation to client groups, rather than indulging in an artistic jog through the arts world. Nevertheless, the debate is welcome.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) mentioned the number of arts questions tabled. Now that we have a Minister able to answer arts questions in this House, there is some point tabling arts questions. However, 10 minutes once a month is hardly sufficient. The average number of questions per month over the past 12 months has been 10, and we are not even getting through those. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would ask his right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for more time for arts questions; that would be supported by both sides of the House.

The House has always had a great interest in the arts, but I detect that that has become sharper in recent years. The arts have taken a higher political profile for two main reasons. First, in part, is the current economic climate, in which even the arts world recognises that it must fight its corner in an era of attempted public expenditure cuts. Secondly, the activities of the local authorities, mainly Labour-controlled, have greatly broadened the definition of arts and therefore the extent of public expenditure on the arts. I use the phrase "expenditure on the arts" rather than "subsidy of the arts" advisedly, because we must get the terminology right. Otherwise we could lose many of the arguments about resource allocation by suggesting that investing in the arts is not a fit and proper way to use public expenditure, whether national or local — it is a soft option, a sort of dream topping, on which one should not spend public money. We hear the terms "defence expenditure" and "arts subsidy". My terminology would be that we invest in arts, education and housing, spend on defence and subsidise agriculture — although that point is rather lost as the Ministers who were in the Chamber a short time ago have now gone. It is important that the terminology is correct.

The definition of what is the arts is not simply metaphysical; it holds the key to the public purse. By broadening the definition of arts and by moving from a rather elitist, essentially 19th century understanding to one that recognises a more popular cultural base means that many more art forms have become eligible for public investment by local authorities and regional arts associations. Therefore, it is essential to keep moving the frontiers of definition within the arts.

There is little doubt that Mozart and Bach would have composed film and television scores and used electronic keyboards and synthesisers. Shakespeare would undoubtedly have written plays for television — indeed, posthumously he has — /Interruption./ Posthumously, he has been given a great deal of television coverage, although, unfortunately, he has not benefited from the repeat fees that he no doubt would have welcomed. It is an interesting point. I believe that it has been said that if we had been able to claim all the copyright fees from Shakespeare since Tudor times, there would never have been a balance of payments problem in this country.

Had Shakespeare been knocking around today, he might also have been contributing to EastEnders and Coronation Street, because he was essentially a commercial playwright who earned his bread.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if Shakespeare had been around today he, like Sam Wanamaker, would not have been allowed to establish a playhouse in Southwark because of the short-sightedness and small-mindedness of Southwark council?

Mr. Banks: That is an interesting point. I know that Sam Wanamaker has been pushing that idea around for a long time, and I have spoken to him about it in the past. I should very much like a playhouse to be established in Southwark on the site of the old theatre. I believe that it would add a great deal to London, provided that we did not start treating the arts merely as heritage. The hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) rather suggested that he still sees the arts as heritage, but Shakespeare was very radical in his day. Had he been around today, some Conservative Members might have said that his plays were too political and should not receive GLC subsidy. Those are all interesting points, but I agree with the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) that that theatre should be established in Southwark.

Mr. Murphy: To correct any misunderstanding, I should make it clear that I do not necessarily equate the arts with heritage. Like the hon. Gentleman, I accept that there is a great role for the living arts and looking towards the future. On the subject of Shakespeare, does the hon. Gentleman accept that Shakespeare was an excellent example of private sponsorship and that succeeding Governments could have gained considerably from such sponsorship?

Mr. Banks: The GLC was not around at the time, but had we been around I am sure that we would have given Shakespeare a grant.

Mr. Buchan: I am sure that the GLC, especially under my hon. Friend's chairmanship, would have given Shakespeare a grant. It would then no doubt have been attacked by Conservative Members for profligacy.

Mr. Banks: As many people subsequently realised, Shakespeare to some extent re-wrote history in favour of the Tudors, which may have had something to do with the source of his funding.

Mr. Greenway: In his day and posthumously, Shakespeare was one of the richest men of all time, but the GLC would no doubt have given him a grant all the same.

Mr. Banks: If he was that rich, he would no doubt have been contributing a great deal in tax and rates.

I feel that the drift of my speech has been somewhat lost, although I am glad to have stimulated so much activity on the Tory Benches. One could go on to talk about Leonardo da Vinci using photography and video but I shall not go into any further examples for fear of raising too much interest among Conservative Members. I have used those examples to demonstrate the clear link between art forms and the state of technology, a link which is not recognised in the enabling legislation relating to the arts.

The Local Government Act 1972 defines culture very much in 19th century terms — classical orchestral music, ballet, opera and art galleries — and no one would deny that they are art forms, but 20th century art forms such as television, photography, video, record distributions, community radio and community bookshops simply do not figure in that legislation. That is important, because, although authorities such as the GLC tried hard to promote cultural diversity, we found the legislation serverely lacking and at times exceedingly frustrating when we sought to extend the range of arts organisations to be funded.

The Minister, in his opening speech, congratulated the Government on muting the impact of the abolition of the GLC. In our last debate on this, I said that within six to 12 months

> "Up to 100 arts organisations in London could cease to exist". — [Official Report, 28 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 1183.]

I would not wish to change one word of that, because the impact will be felt most in the ethnic and community arts sectors. It will not be evident to Ministers and hon. Members but it will be felt deeply by the communities affected.

Last Monday I asked the Minister a question about the black arts centre at the Roundhouse. I have received a letter from Remi Kapo who is doing his best to get things going at the Roundhouse. He says:

> "I feel that it is unrealistic of the Arts Minister to expect a centre like the Roundhouse, in the light of the social situation that exists in Britain today, to be able to raise £8·5 million without the direct assistance of the state".

[Mr. Banks]

Now that the GLC has gone, the only source in London of capital money for the arts has also gone. The Arts Council has got rid of its housing the arts budget. Capital constraints on local authorities are such that they cannot make capital contributions. Where can the black arts centre at the Roundhouse go for the money? I ask the Minister at least to meet representatives from the Roundhouse so that they can explain their position to him and so that he can consider ther plight more sympathetically.

When I walked into the Chamber today I had already predicted exactly who would be here because the subject attracts the same crowd. I recall years ago going to watch footbal matches. I turned up on the terrace and knew exactly who would be standing nearby and who would get the Bovril at half-time.

Some right hon. and hon. Members believe that we should not provide money for the arts. They believe that the arts should stand or fall according to their resources. The matter comes up frequently at Question Time. The arts have been supported from outside for a long time. We enjoyed a diversion earlier when we discussed Shakespeare. In the seventeenh and eighteenth centuries the patronage of individuals enabled the arts to flourish. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the state has had that role. The state, on behalf of us all, not as an alien creation, invests in the arts. But many are still reluctant to acknowledge the state's role in cultural matters. Many think of the arts as an elusive private world rather than a complex social, economic and political structure.

The state works through non-elected quangos, which are given an assumed indentity to make them look as if they are elected bodies. They are described as councils. I think of the Arts Council the Sports Council, the British Council and the Press Council. The illusion is that they are democratic, but we know that they are not.

The state attempts to obscure its role in policy matters by adopting such spurious devices as the arm's length principle. I reject that principle. It is intendend to take the arts out of politics, but it does not. This debate is in a political forum. Under the arm's length principle Government influence is by remote control.

The appointees to all the quangos described as councils tend to reflect the same view of the world as the politicians who make the appointments. That is only human and is as true of a Labour Government as of a Conservative Government. This shows the high level of hypocrisy that exists in British politics all the time and not only now. We delude ourselves if we say that politics can be removed from certain areas of activity. It is said more and more in the House, especially by those who do not like what is going on in the various spheres of social activity, that politics should be taken out of education, the Civil Service, health and the arts, and Mr. Widdicombe more or less suggested that we should take politics out of local government. That cannot be done. We in this place should know as well as anyone that politics are central to all aspects of society's organisation, even to the quality of the air that we breathe. At one time we could say that the graveyard was the only place where politics did not intrude, but given the controversy surrounding the death benefit I am not sure about that now.

I have been assured by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, that the next Labour Government will set up a Ministry of culture that will cover all cultural activities. It will operate as far as possible through elected local authorities.

The Minister has made great play about the amount of money that is being spent on the arts. I do not want to detain the House for too long by going through all the different forms of analysis that can be presented to show that instead of spending large sums on the arts, the Government have removed funding.

If I could find the document among all the detritus on the Bench from which I am speaking, I would refer the Minister to a statement that has been issued by the Arts Council which shows that on the basis of the retail price index—this was argued by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South—the arts have lost out in real terms since the Government were elected.

I shall not cross swords with the Minister on that arid topic. I shall merely contrast the amount that we spend on defence, which is £18,000 million a year, with the budget for the arts that is operated through the Minister's Office. Only 0·6 per cent. of the Government's expenditure for 1985-86 was directed to the arts. The values of a society that can spend such vast sums on weapons of death and destruction and so little on great creativity that the arts present for the people as a whole are all wrong.

We spend money on the arts because it is one of the finest areas of public investment in both social and economic terms. It is an investment in human creativity and there is no finer investment that we can make. It is in the arts and through the arts that we see people at their best, whether they are producers or consumers. The Minister has said that there are more people enjoying the arts than enjoy football matches, and that is true. Also we tend not to get the crowd violence at the opera house that we see, unfortunately, at football matches from time to time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South, has said that the Labour party would invest heavily in the arts. That is because the arts remove the blinkers from our eyes. The artist can convey powerful messages about the nature of the society in which a people live. That is why over the years, and in different systems, the artist has found that books have been burned and work has been suppressed. That has happened because of the immensely powerful medium that the arts presents for those who want to get over a message, and that is why the next Labour Government will invest in the arts in a big way. It is one of the finest forms of investment, and through the flourishing of the arts the British people will perhaps understand more of the nature of the society in which they live.

If cultural activity is taken as a whole, it is an extensive industry. The Musicians Union produced some evidence recently to show that copyright produces about 2·5 per cent. of gross national product. The amount is greater than that produced by the motor car industry and the food manufacturing industry. That shows the size of the cultural industries we are considering.

According to the institute of employment research at Warwick university, jobs in the leisure, artistic and sports category are set to increase by 30 per cent. during the 1980s. When that is added to the £6,000 million produced by the tourist industry, it can be seen that the cultural institutions are an enormous industry. The industry needs more planning, support and encouragement than it is getting from the Government. I look forward to the day when my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South, as Secretary of State, with a full Cabinet position — the head of a Ministry of culture — will unveil to a packed House — there will be more people in it than there are today — the new, cultural industry strategy of the new Labour Government.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I am not in complete disagreement with what the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said. I shall present my case to the House. My first book was published when I was 26 years of age. It was the first of 14 books which I have written. That book is about to be reissued. I never received a penny of public money to be an historian and to write my books. I am a supporter of Government assistance and support for the arts. I should like the hon. Gentleman and the House to bear in mind that some people who entered the fields of music, art and literature have had to do so alone. Perhaps we have been better off — not financially — as a result.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Blaenau, Gwent (Mr. Foot) is not present. I thought that it was fairly typical to try to attract Byron back to Oxford from Cambridge. I have a high regard for the right hon. Gentleman because he was the author of "The Pen and the Sword", which I still regard as one of the finest biographies, if not the finest, written in the past 30 years.

I welcome the opportunity to make a brief intervention, not least because it is the first occasion I have had to congratulate, publicly, my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts on his appointment. He and I served happily in the Foreign Office under the leadership of Lord Carrington. I am glad that my right hon. Friend is in his present position. Perhaps I should declare an interest in public lending right in that last year over 20,000 people borrowed my books. As this week has been, so far, the best week for higher education in this Parliament, I hope that this benign generosity will continue.

As the House is aware, there are five university museums — Cambridge, Oxford, Birmingham, London and Glasgow — whose costs are still met exclusively from the budget of the University Grants Committee. There has been a consistent annual reduction in the universities' budgets, in real terms, of 2 per cent. That has had a particularly strong effect on the universities and museums which are inevitably at the bottom of the list of priorities.

If I declare a personal interest in the case of Fitzwilliam museum in Cambridge, it is not simply because it is in my constituency. My father's first cousin, the late Montague Rhodes James, who was most famous for his ghost stories, was the provost of King's and Eton, and the second director of the Fitzwilliam.

With the exception of occasional donations and assistance for acquisitions, the museums are still treated as though they are part of universities; whereas in reality they are national institutions of real quality and importance. I remember, as a schoolboy, the great benefit I received from the Ashmolean in Oxford. The museums are not just for the universities; they are for the people of the cities, visitors, tourists and scholars. To regard them simply as part of the universities is, in my view, a ridiculous anachronism. I have made that point to previous Secretaries of State and I reiterate it to the new one. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts to discuss this matter with the new Secretary of State and to look hard at this lamentable anachronism.

Obviously, we in Cambridge are delighted by the news that the Royal Observatory is coming to Cambridge. We are grateful for the student grant review. As the vice-president of the appeal fund for Ely cathedral, I am delighted by the help that we have received from John Paul Getty II and the deserved honour that he has received. As trustee of the Cambridge symphony orchestra, I have looked again at the way in which the Budget has assisted the arts and the heritage.

Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts in his discussions with the my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will, while thanking and praising him for the changes in the Finance Bill, emphasise that this is a good first step but should not be regarded as the end of encouragement to business, industry and individuals to invest and to promote not only their past but their children's future in all elements of the arts.

1.6 pm

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the Minister for having to leave after my contribution but I have to attend an important artistic event in my constituency — my daughter is dancing in the local festival — and I am committed to being there to see that major achievement.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is a good excuse.

Mr. Hancock: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman thinks so.

The Minister hit the nail on the head when he commented on the lack of Social Democratic party policy on the arts. That lack is regrettable but I am pleased to say, and I am sure that the Minister will be pleased to hear, that we hope that the SDP's new policy on the arts will be produced by the end of July. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will eagerly await a copy. I am sure that it is aimed in the right direction.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman assure the House that, if that document is produced by the SDP, it will not immediately be repudiated by its leader?

Mr. Hancock: I shall come later to the finer details of how we arrived at that policy.

The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) rightly drew attention to the quote that he and my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) used. They drew the attention of the arts world and the population generally to the importance of the newer forms of the arts, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). They both used the examples of "The Boys from the Blackstuff" and "Cathy Come Home".

Mr. Tony Banks: Did I?

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Member for Paisley, South did so. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West drew attention to the lack of importance given to new forms of the arts.

Hon. Members used those programmes to stress the importance of the artistic ability of the writer and the performer to bring across to the population the many things that were wrong in society and the reasons why there had been deterioration to such an extent that the new form of television production was the only effective way of getting them across. That is an important point.

It is no secret that there has always been a certain unease in the relationship between artists and politicians. It has been increased of late by the master and servant relationship which has been such a feature of the Tory approach. That unease could be dispelled if the arts were made an issue of state. The arts are generally in need of that reassurance. I am glad to say that the alliance is pledged and committed to make the arts an essential part of its political manifesto at the next general election.

There is no civilised society that does not recognise and respect artistic endeavour. There can surely be no healthy society where the arts are not vital to society's well-being. I hope that there is no future Government, of whatever persuasion, who do not aim to encourage the arts and to promote public participation in and appreciation of the arts.

An effective cultural policy cannot be separated from the philosophy which it informs. Equally, it must embody a vision of society and an awareness of the consequences of current social change. At no time in recent history has our society faced such a rapid and overpowering change as it does now. It is a technological and social change for which our political institutions are, regrettably, insufficiently prepared. Meanwhile, two issues are being pushed from the political fringe to the main stream of the new political agenda and that push is long overdue. Those two subjects are the arts and the environment. Therefore, the importance of a cultural policy as an essential part of any political party's manifesto has never been more apparent or more important.

In the 1960s much argument was devoted to what was labelled the technological society of the future. That future is now with us. Much has also been written about the increased leisure time, a concept which many hon. Members justly feel has been done to death. Yet increased leisure time has arrived for a significant number of people in the form of dehumanising and debilitating unemployment. How can questions concerning educational objectives be answered satisfactorily? I shall try to expose the weakness in the current policy and what we should be doing in the future to answer that undoubted need.

In a post-industrial society the arts policy has a vital educational role to play, offering a range of solutions to questions about lifestyle and the use of time in the increasingly leisured age in which we find ourselves. It is not always commonly assumed that the Government have responsibility for leisure and the creation of pleasure. However, the ancient and unquestioned issues of state, such as defence, education and health, are merely self-serving if detached from the more central objective; the creation of a civilised society which combines work with leisure and labour with pleasure. The arts are inseparable from a civilised society and we must accept, once and for all, that the arts are an issue of state in their own right and should be recognised as such.

The structural reform which I believe we undoubtedly need is having to be looked at seriously and hopefully that reform will take place. Nowhere is the divorce of the arts from the old issues of state more apparent than in the structure of the state support for the arts. The machinery of government is at fault. Broadcasting comes under the Home Office, heritage comes under the Department of the Environment, the arts in education comes under the Department of Education and Science, the promotion of arts abroad comes under the Foreign Office, the subsidised arts are sponsored by the Office of Arts and Libraries and the commercial arts, until 1985, were primarily a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry.

Can you imagine, Mr. Deputy Speaker, any Government structure more calculated to avoid all possibility of a coherent cultural policy? We must not continue to bind ourselves in a deep-rooted fear of a centralised Ministry of culture. We should all urge the Government and any future Government to reform the structure to create that Ministry, which is undoubtedly needed, and in whose support so many hon. Members have spoken.

I am glad to say—I draw the attention of the hon. Member for Paisley, South to this point—that I and my colleagues in the Social Democratic party have at long last got our act together as regards our arts policy and our Liberal partners have devoted much of their time to the debate. Although our deliberations have been independent, I am glad to say that on this issue we came to the same conclusion.

There are basic and practical reasons why there should be a Ministry for the Arts, combining the areas of common purpose, such as the arts and libraries, broadcasting and film. It is equally right and important that the Minister for the Arts should have Cabinet status. I hope that the alliance, if in a position of power, will propose that that responsibility should be exercised by one of the three non-departmental Cabinet Ministers, with the day-to-day responsibility resting with a Minister of State.

The cultural quangos which have been spoken about by other hon. Members are things that the alliance would like to see fundamentally changed. We also share the anxiety over the position of non-Government cultural bodies such as the Arts Council, the BBC, the British Film Institute, the Museums and Galleries Commission and the Crafts Council. The concept of freedom and choice has come to be embodied in the arms length principle that other hon. Members have mentioned. However, that important principle has increasingly come under attack from Right and Left. I suggest that the Left denies its continued usefulness as a principle, while the Right abuses it by appointing to the quangos those who share the same political preferences.

We in the alliance deplore those positions, and find them wholly unacceptable. We favour the retention of at least some quangos, but we are equally committed to radical reform of quangos by having directly elected people from regional organisations on them. Hon. Members might make the normal accusation that a balancing act is apparent in those suggestions but, as the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) said, what is needed is for change to be taken a step at a time. The abolition of quangos in some areas and better ways of appointing members of quangos are the first steps that we should take. Therefore, I feel that the setting up of a Ministry is of prime importance, to give the arts the involvement that they undoubtedly need.

I refer to the financing of the arts. Now that they are under pressure to offer a wider-ranging and more comprehensive service to society, it is obvious that extra resources must be found for them, yet no Government —I make no exception for the alliance—can promise that vast increases in funds will be readily available; nor can the arts simply mark up their prices and still maintain access to everyone.

There is a need for local authorities to produce a four-year arts development plan for submission to their regional arts associations, which could issue challenge funds for a range of agreed developments over that four-year planning period. The main concern would be to enable an expansion of resources by a participative approach, which would buttress the arts grant system with tax incentive structures and other legislative and fiscal measures. That will undoubtedly become apparent in our document, which I hope will be published by the end of July.

One effective method of encouraging private citizens to give to the arts would be to extend direct tax breaks to the private donor. That would attract greater spontaneity of generosity than is currently possible under the unwieldy four-year covenant system, and it would provide an obvious incentive to the donor to do more.

I have outlined some of the ways of financing the arts, but it must be stressed that direct Government expenditure must be forthcoming and must be seen in a more creative way than it is now. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have talked about the difficulties in which many people in the arts find themselves over VAT, and hon. Members have also rightly brought to the attention of the Minister the National Campaign for the Arts' latest handout, which refers to the sum of £140 million a year that the Exchequer gets directly from the arts. What a major step forward it would be if such resources could be directed back to the arts. What a major boost it would be at all levels if that innocuous sum could be put aside. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider the points made by his colleagues on that matter.

The first phase of any increase should aim to achieve a fairer balance of expenditure between regions where investment in the arts has been low and metropolitan London where investment has been highest. The second phase should allow a general increase in per capita expenditure throughout the country. The implications of an enlightened arts policy extend far beyond the artistic community. The advance of information technology and cable and satellite will pose fresh challenges not only to a Government but to an artistic world through the 1990s and into the next century.

The increase of tourism and leisure time will necessitate the upkeep of Britain's cultural image and the expansion of its cultural resources. The political view that there are no votes in the arts is outdated and misguided. The alliance has the will to act as a catalyst to the abundance of British artistic talent and to invest in that potentially powerful industry. The failure of any political party or politician to recognise that would be a major folly.

My constituency of Portsmouth is rich in heritage and flourishing in the arts world. Nevertheless, the only theatre in the city of Portsmouth, the King's theatre, is under grave threat, once again through lack of resources and the lack of ability to produce the goods that are needed in an area with a population of nearly 250,000 people. Once again, VAT has grave implications for the organisation that runs the theatre. Valued though its attempts are to sustain the theatre, it cannot go on indefinitely trying to achieve what is best artistically in the city of Portsmouth. I do not want that theatre to close, or the theatre to suffer in my constituency. The Government should be committed to helping theatres such as the King's theatre and others in the south which are struggling. That can be done only if there is a change of heart in the Government towards the way in which they treat the arts in general and theatres in particular.

In an area so rich in heritage as Portsmouth and Hampshire, enormous bonuses could be obtained from investment in the right area, not only by creating more tourism but by creating instant jobs by opening more of our heritage to more people. It is sad that, after 50 to 60 years, people will be charged to visit HMS Victory. The same is true for museums. Charges will be a deterrent to people taking their families to visit major attractions such as HMS Victory. There is so much wealth in our heritage that the Government should be able to identify areas of special interest and place resources there. A few million pounds invested in pump-priming exercises would show a return not only of many hundreds of jobs but of countless millions of pounds brought into the country through tourism.

I hope that today's debate is not exceptional, and that we need not wait another two years for a debate on the arts. The hon. Member for Paisley, South said that the previous large-scale debate on the arts was on 14 June 1984. That is interesting, because it is the day on which I was elected to the House.

Mr. Buchan: We cannot have everything can we?

Mr. Hancock: The excuse that day was that many Tory Members had to be in Portsmouth, South, defending that Tory seat from my challenge. Their presence hindered their candidate's ambitions of getting here, and helped mine. It was distasteful that the Government used my by-election and the European elections to hide the arts debate then, and they are using a Friday today.

I hope that the number of hon. Members who have taken part in the debate shows the Minister that he has the sympathy of the House. All that he needs is the strength to take this issue to the Cabinet and get more resources from the Goverment.

I apologise for leaving the Chamber now, but on this occasion my family is more important than this place.

1.22 pm

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) indulged in a romantic reverie about the ideal future—the Socialist utopia—in which the arts would be fully funded by the state, or fully directed by the state. Did he take into account the reality in areas where local authorities have a responsibility to promote the arts but have reacted in a small-minded and philistine way? I cite examples in my constituency. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) kept his conscience clean by saying that he did not buy The Times, but he took advantage of the copies in the Library. Such privileges are not available to my constituents who cannot read some newspapers in the public libraries because of the censorship exercised by Southwark borough council. The council refuses to stock some newspapers, for political reasons. Is that the generous attitude to the arts which the Socialist authorities of the future will adopt? If it is, we should note it now.

I noted also the patronising—if not denigrating and disparaging — way in which the hon. Member for Paisley, South quoted the firm which said that it wished to sponsor only those exhibitions with which it felt comfortable. Has he considered the activities with which Socialist Councils feel comfortable? In my constituency, there is a fine heritage site at Nunhead cemetery. It is a remarkable legacy from the past. Through beneficial neglect, it has become a nature reserve with wildlife exceptional in south London. An enthusiastic band of people have formed themselves into the friends of Nunhead cemetery to help to preserve and conserve it and to ensure that the facilities are made known to the area and treasured by it. But they are prohibited by the restrictive trade union attitudes of Southwark borough council from taking any part in maintaining the paths or clearing the ground.

Is that the way to harness enthusiasm for and participation in the arts? Is this how a Socialist authority will in future supervise, mastermind and direct the arts? If so, there is every reason to have "The Glory of the Garden", with a great deal of diverse funding and activities, rather than one central coherent cultural policy. That would be the dead hand which would devastate the flowering of the arts.

The Globe playhouse and Shakespeare's role in Southwark was referred to earlier, and I am pleased to see that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is now present. We have seen the absurd hostility which Southwark council has directed towards this imaginative scheme, and I wonder whether the Opposition spokesman for the arts will use his influence to assist Southwark council towards enlightenment and to encourage it to reconsider the matter.

It is interesting to note that Shakespeare, who has been prayed in aid for the Opposition's view, worked at diverse levels. He produced great art, as we now recognise it; he produced popular entertainment, as we might now perceive it; and he was involved in a commercial activity which made great profit, to the ultimate benefit of the community at large. Edward Alleyn, the actor-manager of Shakespeare's company, made a great fortune which he used to establish schools in the southern end of the borough in Dulwich. He left other charitable bequests for the care for the young and the elderly.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thought for a moment that the hon. Gentleman was about to claim that Shakespeare was one of his constituents. Returning to the reconstruction of the Globe in Southwark, has the hon. Gentleman spoken to the Minister to see whether any funds are coming from that source, because Southwark borough council is extremely hard-pressed?

Mr. Bowden: It is a matter of planning rather than of funding, and the hon. Gentleman may like to use some of his influence on his Socialist colleagues on Southwark council. If we could overcome their inexplicable hostility to an imaginative cultural centre, it would do a great deal to regenerate life in an otherwise deprived part of London. I know that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey will forgive me for putting it in that way. I wish that Southwark council would think again. What I say will have no influence, but what the Opposition say may influence it.

From Edward Alleyn's schools and almshouses came the offshoot of a most interesting private gallery, the Dulwich picture gallery. I shall not go into its history, but a series of incidental and almost accidental events produced a magnificent collection of pictures of worldwide fame and status. The gallery is private and responsible for its own upkeep, but it has harnessed the community to it in a most constructive way. It makes an entry charge. I have no qualms about that, because many people are prepared, and indeed happy, to pay to see this great private benefaction. It has brought into play the friends of the Dulwich gallery who give of their services, time, expertise and enthusiasm voluntary to ensure that the gallery is staffed in a way which would not be possible if salaries had to be paid for their attendance.

I am grateful to the Minister's predecessor for looking favourably on the appeal launched by the Dulwich gallery to improve its security. It received sums from institutional donors, individuals and the Government, for which the people of Dulwich are extremely grateful. The Dulwich picture gallery appeal had a mixed bunch of contributions, rather than funding from a single source. I see that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is present. In a previous incarnation he made some contribution to the Dulwich gallery as chairman of the arts committee of Greater London council. It was gratefully received, but it was not without strings, whereas that which came from Government came freely and without any pressure.

Multiple funding and support is a strength of arts provision in Britain. I hope that I shall be forgiven by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) if I trespass into his constituency, but I recently came upon a most interesting form of private enterprise provision in the arts, which, perhaps, cannot be found elsewhere.

A private gallery has been established on the island of Portland on the Chesil beach. Those who walk along that wild, romantic seafront come across a small stone building which is an art gallery. One might not think of that part of Portland as a centre of arts excellence, but this gallery plays a full part in community life there. It is multi-faceted. It recently mounted an exhibition on the work being done to improve the seaworthiness of the Chesil beach. The firm of civil engineers involved sponsored an exhibition at the gallery to show the local community what is happening. The arts are being used as a form of communication and community adherence there.

The gallery was founded by an enthusiastic individual who had been a teacher in an art school. She wants to give young artists who are unable to get sponsorship through commercial galleries or those who wish to display their work without going through the difficulties of mounting an exhibition in a big gallery the opportunity to show their work while living in the gallery. That has not been promoted by the local authority or the Arts Council: it might be described as private patronage. It is the sort of initiative to be encouraged.

I fear that, if we had a Minister of culture and a "coherent culture and arts policy", there would be no momentum for such private promotion. The opportunity would still exist, but without that blend of enthusiasm, challenge and a hint of commerce it would lack spark. I wholeheartedly applaud the approach which my right hon. Friend the Minister has taken. We should not look to just one source to finance the arts. We should seek pluralism. In that way, we will ensure the strength of the arts so that they may flourish, their independence assured.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): No Opposition Member would disagree with the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) about a plural approach to the arts. We complain that the Government are neglecting their resposibilities as part of that plurality.

The hon. Member for Dulwich will remember that the Minister's predecessor, Lord Gowrie, had a high profile as the Minister with responsibility for the arts. When he was Minister, the arts were on the political agenda. At least, the Minister was on television. That might not be quite the same thing, but Lord Gowrie felt that the two were synonymous. Unfortunately, the energy and activity that he brought to the arts and art policy was almost wholly destructive.

Under the new Minister, the Government have returned to the more usual quietude, near passivity, even, possibly, torpor in regard to arts policy. Perhaps most people in the arts world would say that that passivity is preferable to the damage wrought by his predecessor.

If someone cannot do good, he should at least do nothing. The Minister's languid non-style demonstrated just how that passive attitude towards the arts has developed in the Government's thinking. I listened carefully to the Minister's speech and shall take up some of his points. He laid down what he believed was an adequate framework for the arts. He used words such as challenge, tremendous, outstanding, and immense, which were all verbal attempts to inject vigour into a policy that was noticeable for its lack of it. No amount of tired adjectives can hide the complete inadequacy of the Government's policy towards the arts.

The Minister said that after 10 years, business sponsorship now amounted to £20 million out of his figure of £320 million spent on the arts. That is less than 7 per cent. It was complained that that was not even on the margin. One must agree that 7 per cent. represents a very marginal element of expenditure on the arts. The Minister also referred to private patronage and spoke about the generosity of John Paul Getty and the not entirely unconnected fact that he was made a knight. He also mentioned Mrs. Sainsbury—perhaps she can expect to be made a dame in the near future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said that the Government's policies were more like those pursued in the 19th century. Typically, he was being too generous. In lauding private patronage, the Minister was bravely leading the country back to the 18th century. The Government can certainly take no credit when it comes to funding the arts. They are doing little to promote private patronage through tax incentives even though that might be consistent with their views.

Undoubtedly some very good things flow from private patronage. One need think only of the Sainsbury bequest to the University of East Anglia, which represents a most remarkable embellishment of that part of the world and is much to be welcomed. But such bequests reflect no credit on the Government and do not represent an adequate national policy for the arts. The Minister also referred to Budget changes, and to immense opportunity. Perhaps he could put some figures on that benefit. He shakes his head, because he probably knows full well that those changes will have a minimal impact on the arts. If he demurs, he should tell us what the benefit to the arts would will be in cash terms.

The Minister also exhorted people to attend performances. We would all agree with that, as it is a fine and laudable aim. But it is not an adequate policy for expanding the range and variety of audiences or for making the arts available to everyone. His words would have more impact if he was prepared to put pressure on the Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to abolish VAT on the performing arts. That, together with a more expanded economy would have an effect on audiences.

The Minister made great play of marketing and claimed that Opposition Members and many of those in the arts thought that marketing was a dirty word. That is absolute nonsense. One of the best examples of marketing the arts that the world has ever known was supplied by the Labour-controlled GLC. It did more than anyone to promote, energise and excite people about the arts in Greater London. Marketing was its speciality. When the GLC existed, one could not open a newspaper without seeing well-designed, attractive and seductive advertisements telling people to visit the South bank or other projects. One seldom sees such advertisements for the South bank now, perhaps because the South bank is under-financed and cannot promote its programmes which were, of course, inherited from the GLC.

Thus the Government's policy is one of marketing, increased exhortation to attendance, tax changes, private patronage and business sponsorship. They are the old Conservative nostrums. They all have a part to play, and no one doubts that. My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) made it clear that the Labour party believes in a pluralist approach. All of those aspects of policy have a role to play, but they do not add up to a national policy. Thus the Government's policy is totally inadequate. The Government do not even begin to address the wider variety of the arts or the need for experimentation, for education, and for community arts, or the needs of rural areas, public libraries and arts centres. All those things must play a role in the arts, but none of them is assisted by any of the policies outlined by the Minister.

The truth is that this Government have created a crisis in the arts that has demoralised artists and administrators throughout the country. If the Minister listens to those he meets when he travels throughout the country, he will know that that is true. If he has not heard that, he has not met the right people. Those administering or creating the arts and the audiences say that the Government's policies are wholly inadequate. The Minister must be deaf or be meeting only a selective range of people because one has to tread carefully to meet people in the arts world who congratulate the Government on their policies.

Some vital and exciting things are happening in the arts because of the Arts Council, such as the building of the Victoria theatre in Stoke-on-Trent—the first purpose-built theatre in the round in this country, rather amazingly. It will be a magnificent theatre and I urge the Minister to visit it. We are grateful to the Arts Council and local authorities for making it possible. However, that does not disguise the fact that so much could and should be happening that is new, exciting and good in the arts. That is not happening because the arts are under funded and administrators are being distracted by having to rush around defending their budgets against inflation and other factors.

The Minister mentioned funding, especially that for the Arts Council. Can he confirm that in a recent letter to the Arts Council – which I understand is not confidential – he indicated that the 1987-88 grant would include an increase of only 2·5 per cent? Can he further confirm that such an increase would be below the likely rate of retail price index inflation? Does he, as a fair-minded man, accept that RPI inflation is not the same as inflation in the arts, which are very labour-intensive? The arts have particular problems, so even if the grant were protected against the normal rate of inflation, it would not be adequate to protect the Arts Council's clients in that year. I should be grateful if the Minister would answer those points when he replies.

[Mr. Mark Fisher]

If I am right in my fear, the Minister must admit that it is a cut in real terms, and inevitably the whole regional development thrust of the Arts Council will have to be frozen. The Minister will know from previous debates that I am not one who fully likes "The Glory of the Garden". I accept that it was probably better than nothing as a regional policy, but although its critique that too much money was being centralised on London was correct, its remedy and treatment were faulty. There is a danger that it will simply recreate in the centres of excellence the same imbalance regionally as hitherto there was nationally.

There must be a dimension to "The Glory of the Garden" for rural areas, arts centres, diversity and touring, which did not have a look in in that document. However, I accept that it is the right direction for the Arts Council, if the wrong specific development. If the Arts Council is to suffer a cut in real terms yet again, that policy will probably have to go as well.

The Minister attempted to make us believe that everything was fine with funding for metropolitan counties. That is not true. Because of the work of local authorities—and no thanks to the Minister—the damage from abolition that could have been wrought on the arts has, for this year, been prevented to some extent. I welcome last week's agreement with Merseyside city council about funding. However, the Minister must acknowledge that even that agreement will leave half a dozen clients—for example, the Philharmonic hall—with a shortfall of funds.

The Minister's idea that everything is fine on Merseyside and elsewhere is simply not true and he knows that because he is a fair-minded man. The situation may not be so bad as some of us feared, but that is thanks to the local authorities. All is far from well this year and the impact of abolition for the metropolitan areas in 1987-88 will be grim indeed. Is it true that the Arts Council funds to address the problems of abolition in 1987-88 are to be tapered from £25 million to £21 million? Is the Minister still asking local authorities to find £4 million more, and how does he intend to resolve that problem? Will he urge his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to release local government from its financial constraints so that it can address that and the many other problems facing it?

There is one further specific point to be dealt with in this catalogue of questions about the Arts Council. Will the Minister side with the Arts Council in its attempt to get a fair deal for visual artists and photographers who, in my view and that of experts who know far more about the subject than I do, are being put in a highly invidious position by the Government's failure to ratify and implement the Berne convention. As I am sure the Minister knows, counsel's opinion is that section 4(3) of the Copyright Act 1956 is in contravention of the Berne convention and is enormously to the prejudice of visual artists and photographers. Will the Minister join the Arts Council in putting pressure on the Department of Trade and Industry to resolve the matter and to ensure that new legislation equalises the position and brings it into line with the Berne convention? I think that that will cost the Minister nothing, but the arts world, and especially the visual arts, will be extremely grateful.

To return to my central point about the funding of the Arts Council in the metropolitan areas, the whole thrust of expansion of the arts in those areas has been lost. The money may have been saved, but the enormous drive that those authorities – as bodies as well as funding organisations – to expand the arts in those areas has been lost, together with the impulsion towards new audiences and new ways of looking at arts provision and further expansion of arts content. The metropolitan authorities and even the GLC had only begun a process that must continue for the good of the arts world. They gave a brief glimpse of the kind of arts culture that would benefit this country and reflect all aspects of life in this country, an arts culture that would reflect in our cities and rural areas the views, aspirations and ideals of minorities as well as wider communities, of those who dissent from what the Government are doing as well as those who applaud it, those who are suffering under the Government as well as those in other parts of the country who are prospering, those who are angry at what is happening in our society and wish to change it as well as those who are content. The arts policy of the metropolitan counties allowed that variety of expression and that kind of vision of the world in which we live, and that is what the arts should be doing.

The metropolitian counties were also starting to increase the audience for the arts as well as training in the arts, but there is a great deal more to do. I am sure that the Minister, like other hon. Members, will have received letters from constituents who have enormous talent, or whose children have enormous talent, but cannot go to the drama, dance and music schools that they need, and to which the country needs them to go, because they can no longer obtain discretionary awards. Some of the most frustrating and tragic constituency cases involve young people with talent, ability and great enthusiasm whom local authorities are having to inform that there is no money for discretionary awards so they cannot help them develop into dancers, visual artists or actors. The Government are saying, "If you have money, fine, you have a chance to develop. If you have no money, tough luck." That is not fair to the individuals. It is not good for the arts or for the country that such talent should be wasted. What does the Minister intend to do to address the question of discretionary awards and in-service training?

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are pertinent to me because recently I was told about a 12-year-old who is an excellent dancer with a wonderful pedigree and background but who is unable to obtain the funding to go to the only place in Britain to give her a chance of a career as a dancer. The problem affects not only teenagers and young adults, but the very young. Other countries which attach importance to culture ensure that young people with talent are supported.

Mr. Fisher: I agree. Such young people will not necessarily be Nureyevs, David Hockneys or Janet Smiths, but they should be allowed to develop their love of and interest in the arts and to provide the basis of the new audience which will comprise not only middle class people with an enriched education or people with a home background that widens their appreciation, but be a wider and new audience. To some extent local authorities were helping to develop that wider audience. I hope that the Government will examine seriously the possibility of imposing a mandatory rate so that all local authorities will be able to take the arts as seriously as the metropolital authorities took them.

We must consider the importance of the rural areas. We must establish arts centres in such areas and encourage touring dance and drama groups, large and small, to perform before expanding audiences. We must target interest on the neglected sectors and potential audiences.

I am thinking of the ethnic minorities and the rich mutual exchange of arts culture and arts dialogue. The new and wider audiences will come from the young through theatre and dance in education, artists in residence and writers in schools. Arts education must be built into the core curriculum and should be part of the core teacher-training curriculum. It is important that primary school teachers in particular have an understanding and love of arts teaching.

The excellent Gulbenkian report lies on the shelves gathering dust because of lack of funds. That is a tragedy. The majority of young people experience no educational drama. In some secondary schools they have that opportunity, but the majority of secondary schools are not able to offer such education. The majority of young people experience no dance education. The visual arts are crammed in with design technology, which is an insult to the worthy elements of a curriculum.

Children leave school without confidence in their ability to think or express their feelings through creative writing. The awful truth is that many young people leave school without visiting the theatre, a museum or a gallery and without having been to a dance performance or concert. They have never even been given the taste of the possible horizons. The Minister might find that hard to believe, but it is true throughout the country.

The Minister should address the neglect of young people which will make it impossible to create the wider audience. There is no sense in what the Minister is doing. The arts are central to life and to the life of our young people. The arts are important in terms of how we see our world and how we interpret it, to the stories that we tell ourselves and to the way in which we help each other to look at the world around us. They are important to the way that we open our eyes and express ourselves. All that is important to our young people and to the health of our society. Unfortunately, the Government are doing little to expand the waiting audience that could be benefiting in so many ways. It is sad that the Government lack the necessary vision. It was certainly not apparent in the Minister's speech, well intentioned though he is. If the Government have a policy, it tends to be one—this is the view that is expressed by Conservative Back Benchers rather than by the Minister—that is based on the arts being a piacebo. Conservative Members regard the arts as a source of pleasure and decoration and, possibly, even a distraction from the problems that face our society, but that is not enough for the arts. The arts must be much more than that. They must be challenging. They must extend our vision and make us question and reflect on our life, our culture and the way in which we interact. The arts must concentrate our minds and thoughts rather than distract us. That is a vision for the arts that the Government lack.

Serious though the underfunding and under-resourcing of the arts are, it is a fact that we have a Government and a Minister with responsibilities for the arts, well-intentioned though he is personally, who lack the necessary vision. That is why the arts are in crisis. That is why artists throughout the country are despairing. Incidentally, they are waiting with impatience for the next general election so that they can vote for a Labour Government who will have the necessary vision and will provide the funds to implement it.

1.56 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I could not possibly go down the same road as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), especially as it led to an absurd and unacceptable conclusion upon which the nation will repudiate him within two years of this moment, or thereabouts.

The hon. Member said that when many children leave school they are unable to express themselves through creative writing. That is an extravagant claim. If children leave school with that inability, that must be the result of bad teaching. There has never been a time when there has been a richer culture for our children. Some television programmes, for example, are bad and crude, but many of them are extremely rich. Children are able to pick up much from television as well as from reading.

Mr. Fisher rose——

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman spoke for 26 minutes and I believe that I should be allowed to continue uninterrupted.

I am currently marking 500 or 600 English language examination papers at O-level or above. They include some most interesting and imaginative essays that are full of highly creative writing on all sorts of topics. They come from all parts of the country, including deprived areas, the hon. Gentleman's assertion is bunkum.

It has been tedious to listen to a catalogue of woe from the Opposition Benches, including those occupied by the Liberal and SDP parties, which has been directed only to money. It seems that Opposition Members have no concept of the content of the arts, no concept of the joy of beholding a piece of sculpture, reading a fine book or watching a fine film. There is none of that concept on the Opposition benches.

Mr. Fisher: Rubbish.

Mr. Greenway: As I have said, I listened to the hon. Gentleman for 26 minutes and I have a right to make my contribution.

The danger of the Opposition's approach is to undermine the role that individuals and groups of individuals can play. It is all very well to sit back and feel good because millions of pounds of other people's money are being spent on the arts, but individuals want to make their own contribution to the arts according to their means as well as to other things. The Opposition are wrong to overlook that attitude and to dismiss it.

[Mr. Greenway]

It will be recalled that £71 million of the former GLC's money was redistributed to the London boroughs recently, including Labour-controlled boroughs. For example, £4·2 million was received by the London borough of Ealing. Not one penny of that sum has gone into the arts. That was a windfall if ever there was one for that borough, and other boroughs had similar windfalls. That is true right across London. It is dreadful that none of the money has been directed to the arts.

I know the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan) well and regard him highly and I am sorry that he is not in his place. I was surprised by his assertion that the museums are charging. The hon. Gentleman sat with me on the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts. We heard the Minister — he is in his place today — say to that Committee only a few weeks ago that contributions to museums were contributions only. They were made voluntarily. It was additional money for the work of the museums and would never become charges under the Government. The hon. Gentleman said that they were charges and that the Government had something to answer for. He was not even-handed when he said that.

Recently, in written and oral questions, I asked about the future of the Sadler's Wells theatre. I ask my right hon. Friend in his response to the debate, to reiterate the Government's commitment, in principle and morally, to the Arts Council and to the work of Sadler's Wells, which is greatly appreciated in London and elsewhere. On more than one occasion recently, Sadler's Wells has found itself threatened with possible closure. If that theatre feels that it has the moral support of the Government, the Arts Council — in terms of cash — the support of the public, which unquestionably it has, the support of industry, business, and so on, it can have confidence in its future. I am sure that the theatre has a rich future and that it is appreciated by hon. Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) referred indirectly to newspapers and magazines. There is no greater expression of the nation's ability to read, write, think, argue, discuss, debate and develop points than our diverse newspaper industry. That includes magazines and the rich background of book writing and pamphleteering. Newspapers and magazines on tape are available for the blind and the elderly. If the elderly can no longer see they can listen to tapes.

Newspapers have always been available in public libraries in this country for anyone wishing to read them. They are available in the Library of the House of Commons. The newspapers available and distributed in libraries have always included way out publications, from my point of view — it may not be everyone's point of view — such as the former Daily Worker and the Morning Star of today. Such newspapers are dedicated to undermining our political system.

Sadly, many Labour authorities are banning The Times, the Sun and other National Union of Journalists newspapers from libraries which, after all, are run by public funds. That deprives those who wish to read newspapers of their right to do so. The Labour party must face the fact that that is censorship of a serious and unacceptable kind. The country is disturbed about it. A council in Ealing has banned newspapers from Ealing's libraries which have been available for generations. The public, some of whom voted Labour, are up in arms about that, and rightly so.

If it is the duty of the House to support the arts — that includes one's right to read what one wishes and one's right to say what one wishes, within the law — it must follow that it is outright censorship and downright aggression by the Labour party that newspapers should be banned. The Labour party must face the hard word censorship, which it does not like.

If such action increased and if newspapers such as The Guardian and The Observer were banned, we would be reduced to a Russian position, where people are allowed only to read Pravda. That is a logical conclusion to what the Labour party is doing in many boroughs.

If Labour local authorities take it upon themselves to censor newspapers and magazines, the Government have a duty to preserve freedom of speech. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will exercise the powers which I believe he has under the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964 to order those local authorities to ensure that The Times, The Sun and the other publications which have been banned in that Fascist manner are restored to libraries.

Freedom of speech is fundamental to the life of the nation. When it is attacked, as I have described, the House has a duty unremittingly to keep the matter before the nation. Conservative Members will continue to do that. We are not concerned with what is happening at Wapping. That is a different issue.

Mr. Buchan: It is not.

Mr. Greenway: It is a different issue. The central issue is a man's freedom to read and to speak. I shall not go into the rights and wrongs of Wapping, because that is another matter. It is outrageous that the Labour party allowed it to happen and condoned it in the House. I hope that Labour Members will change their minds and support freedom of speech, as they have always done.

2.6 pm

Mr. Buchan: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to pick up the last point made by the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). I shall fight side-by-side with the hon. Gentleman in defence of the presence of publications in libraries, so long as he will join with me in condemning the monopoly whereby about three people, including Murdoch and Maxwell, dominate the press. That is infinitely worse than any censorship exerted by any local authority. We have fewer newspapers than any other major country. There are aspects of expression and ideas which are not reflected by the press. There is a monopoly by the class supported by the hon. Gentleman. I shall go along with the hon. Member for Ealing, North to defend publications if he will join me in my condemnation. I have said that publicly; let him say the same.

Will the hon. Member for Ealing, North, come with me to see the major wholesalers—Menzies and Smith—and insist that they offer at every outlet every journal published in this country? If he does, I shall go with him on a deputation to his local council in relation to the local library. I shall leave it at that, unless the hon. Gentleman says yes.

A number of valuable points have been put forward but I have to concentrate on only a few of the main themes.

I should like to pick up a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), on abolition. We are concerned not just with funding but with the fact that the abolished local authorities were those that had given us a vision of the type of developments that can play a part in the arts. One of the greatest tragedies for the arts has been the fact that abolition is destroying those local authorities.

Conservative Members claim that there has been full restitution of funding. On the contrary, there are two major aspects where there is still a calamitous and potentially dangerous situation. There are not only the half a dozen companies to which reference has been made but the other groups, about which we do not hear, which would have received support from local authorities, if moneys had not been salted off to make the restitution. Local authorities, regional arts associations and the Arts Council have found the funding, on top of the Government's initial amount, for the bodies that were put at risk, but it has meant that that amount does not go to the rest of the arts. That is an important point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham North-West referred to some of the minor groups about which we have not heard. We have heard about Sadler's Wells, but we have not heard about the consequences for other organisations which have been put at risk because their money was necessary to save Sadler's Wells. That is the crucial point.

The other aspect is that the Government's funding was desperately short. It was £10 million short by the Arts Council's second calculations but it was £19 million short in the total calculations because £9 million should have come from major capital projects which the Arts Council said it could not cope with. By my calculations the funding was between 14 per cent. and 16 per cent. short. That is the truth about abolition and it is no use the Government or the Minister saying anything to the contrary.

Another aspect of the debate is the economic case for the arts. I want to stress three points which I think have been minimised by Conservative Members. It is not a case of the Government somehow generously dipping into pockets and giving out — the donation concept that Conservative Members have mentioned. The hon. Member for Ealing, North complained that we are always talking about money. He asked why we could not lift our eyes to higher things than money. I have noted that it is those people who are well-heeled who are always talking about other people raising the question of money.

Mr. Greenway: I am a teacher.

Mr. Buchan: The hon. Gentleman is as well-heeled here as I am. That issue was reinforced by the Bernard Levin article, which has been referred to. Bernard Levin was talking about working men, and trade unions. He said why cannot they raise their eye from the trough

"to those areas of life which cannot be measured in terms of cash, but which constitute the reason for living? When? Not, to be sure, while the Labour Party is led by men like Michael Foot, and Neil Kinnock nor while the TUC is represented by men like Norman Willis.

He dared to talk about Michael Foot, Neil Kinnock and Norman Willis in connection with the trough. We have a poet as the General Secretary of the TUC. We should be pleased about that. The truth is that the Government have made an absolute apotheosis of the trough. They say, "Get into the trough and take the pickings," and "Get on your bike and look for jobs." They say we should invest and ban exchange controls, and let investment go where it will. The Government have made a positive idol of the trough. Working men who have to struggle should not be dealt with in this way.

I want to deal with the real economic case for the arts. I will talk about the trough because people require jobs. In the arts we have a group of people who are among the worst paid and suffer longer periods of unemployment than almost any other section and who often work in the worst conditions. In fact, the arts are not receiving donations; they pay for themselves. The National Campaign for the Arts shows that value added tax returns £140 million to the Exchequer. That is more than the amount of money coming into the arts from the Arts Council. The arts in this country are self-funding and they are magnificently more than that in relation to the amount they contribute to the general economy of the country through tourism. Were it not for tourism and North sea oil, under the Government we would now be in a terminal condition in relation to our balance of payments. That is the contribution the arts make. We should not talk about spending on the arts because it is a crucial investment for the whole economy of the country.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will accept and reinforce to the Minister the point that in areas of great deprivation, such as my area in the docklands of London, instead of the money and profits going into a sector which does not benefit the local people, we could do much to promote the extension of the South Bank into the docks. There are many young people looking for training and work in the arts, and opportunities in places central to our capital city would bring tourism, revenue and artistic progress. That is what we should be promoting in the docklands, not the capital profit that is made by developers of office blocks, which will have no benefit for local communities.

Mr. Buchan: What the hon. Gentleman says about the South Bank and the docklands is true of the economy as a whole.

Let us look at the scale of the arts. About 200,000 to 250,000 people are in broadcasting. About 200,000 people are in printing, the press and publication — the written word. About 70,000 are involved in the popular music industry — in recording, as artists, producers and so on. We are dealing with a major industry. Broadcasting alone is bigger than the whole computer industry, about which we hear so much. So we are dealing not with small dollops of money to a small group of people, but with the necessity for more investment to a very large section of our community.

The arts pay. The Government's method of creating jobs is to make tax cuts. We say that there should be direct investment in jobs. One area should be the arts. Through tax cuts, it costs about £47,000 a year to take someone off the dole. It takes just over £2,000 to take someone off the dole through investment in the arts. At one thirteenth of the cost, we begin to get jobs back, so the arts pay for themselves. They are self-funding and massively productive in the economy.

I should love to have gone into the Shakespeare business, but I am afraid that I cannot because I am short of time. However, I shall deal with three specific points.

[Mr. Buchan]

The first is the Roundhouse. We should like the Minister to give us an assurance that he will come forward, if not with the £8 million that I think he should for the whole of the black community in this country, at least with the £1 million, so that a start can be made on proper production there.

Secondly, I refer to the squeeze on the universities and its effect on university museums. I have had discussions with directors of most of the university museums. I hope that shortly I shall be able to say something more publicly. But I recognise that they are public institutions as well as university institutions. The task is how to give assistance while still retaining the relationship with the university. We take the point on board.

Finally, I refer to charging. The Conservative party, which says that we should not keep talking about money, is the very party that has been squeezing our museums and galleries so that they are being forced into charging for admission. I shall refer to the irrelevance of the term "charging" in a moment. The Conservatives encourage that by saying that the museums will keep the money that they make. But it would be easier for a poor man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven than for him to squeeze his way between the cash desks at the V and A without the embarrassment of paying. There is a world of difference between erecting a sign at the exit, as is done at the Burrell, saying, "If you have enjoyed this museum would you like to contribute?", and having two girls at cash desks with a narrow space between, through which working people have to pass. We have seen from the figures that some people turn away. It has not helped attendences, and there is no excuse for it. We should be encouraging admissions.

If ever there was a sign of the bankruptcy of ideas and spirit in relation to the arts, it is the fact that one of our major institutions has had to depend on American benefactors to bail it out, to its shame, and that one of our national institutions has introduced charging, not even honestly and openly as direct charging, but as a voluntary contribution. That is all done under the benevolent gaze of this torpor of a Government.

2.18 pm

Mr. Luce: With the leave of the House, I shall seek to answer some of the many points raised in the debate in a short time. Unfortunately, that means that I have to disallow myself from referring to a complimentary reference in Shakespeare — after all, this is a debate about Shakespeare — to a wonderful character called Luce. However, I shall not take up the time of the House on that score.

I listened with care to what the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) said and to the forceful speech by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). He feels passionately and strongly, as does the hon. Member for Paisley, South, about the arts. But when he accuses me of lacking vision, that is below his normal standard. He really means that people can have vision only if the state does everything for the arts. That applies to other walks of life. Simply because I have a genuinely different approach from the hon. Gentleman —I respect his views—it is unfair to accuse me of not having vision. Yes, I have vision, but it is of a different scale and nature to that of the hon. Gentleman.

Before I reflect upon the two speeches of the hon. Member for Paisley, South, may I respond to some of the excellent remarks made by my hon. Friends and others. My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) mentioned the importance of diversity in the arts. That goes to the heart of one of our great differences of opinion with Opposition Members, who constantly say that they do not oppose sponsorship, the Budget changes or museum recipts measures, yet at the same time try to disparage them. The strength of the arts depends upon diversity, not only in funding but generally, and upon not assuming that central Government should interfere in every aspect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) made an excellent speech and raised many issues, many of which related to his constituency. I fully endorse his comments, especially about the importance of tourism and the contribution that the arts can make to tourism.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) made a distinctive speech and mentioned Sadler's Wells. I repeat that I agree entirely that Sadler's Wells is a great centre of excellence. I am glad that the Arts Council has played its part in funding it for this Financial year, along with a great diversity of funding from sponsors and other sources. That has provided a solid base, and we can look to the future with confidence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes-James), who could not be a better Member for that great university town, does great service for that city. He spoke strongly about the university museums and highlighted the Fitzwilliam museum. I note carefully what he said, and I respect the work of the great university museums. I shall take into account his important remarks on that score.

My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) mentioned the importance of marketing and sponsorship. I agree with him, but I pay tribute to his work in the Council of Europe in promoting many of the Government's policies and thoughts about the arts.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) raised many points. He especially probed again about the Roundhouse. I sought to answer his questions at Question Time the other day, but he asked me whether I would consider meeting representatives from the Roundhouse. I am prepared to do that, as long as he understands that the Arts Council will provide the money to fund the transitional period. I shall listen to their views.

The hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan) mentioned the policies, which have been confirmed this week, to remove some of the obstacles to museums raising extra revenue. He suggested that that is a back-door method of forcing museums to introduce charges. I must take the opportunity to refute that. The Government's policy is to leave it to the discretion of the trustees of museums — who after all know the position best and can judge whether it is right and will easily generate extra revenue, and enable them to improve their services — to introduce charges or voluntary donations. It is entirely up to the trustees and no part of my policy to try to force the issue.

The Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts recommended unanimously in 1981-82 that we should remove some of the obstacles to revenue-raising. The decision in line with that should be broadly welcomed by the museums and galleries.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Luce: I have very little time and I must not give way if I am to be fair to other hon. Members.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) made a powerful speech and focused on the Byron Society and asked me to take an interest. He gave me notice that he could not be here for the winding-up speeches, but I assure him that I shall take a close interest in the arrangements for the 1988 celebrations of the 200th anniversary of Byron's birth.

The right hon. Gentleman then led me down an avenue towards Melina Mercouri and the Elgin marbles. The Government's stance is quite clear and oft-stated. We have replied to the Greek Government. I understand that, if it is ever returned to power, the Labour party will return the Elgin marbles. Has it thought the matter through properly? The marbles are important, but they are not unique. There are other great and marvellous collections of Syrian and Egyptian material for example. Do the Opposition realise where the precedent of returning the Elgin marbles would lead? I wonder whether they have thought it all through.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), who also gave notice that he could not be here for the winding-up speeches for good reasons, confirmed for me the confusion that still exists in the so-called alliance. I was not clear whether he was for the arm's length policy or against it and I became even more confused when I listened to him.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) and others mentioned VAT. I note what they said. It is part of the wider Government policy on VAT and indirect taxation that VAT should be as broadly based as possible. Hon. Members know that the Government have introduced other tax incentives to try to help the arts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel does a great deal for the west end theatres and I was glad to meet the Society of West End Theatre. I have noted the additional arguments that he made and I shall try to respond in more detail by letter.

I hope that I have now responded to all except the hon. Member for Paisley, South. His speech bore out everything that I said at the beginning. However sincere he may be, he is in the habit of being a prophet of doom. Of course there are many problems, but he will not acknowledge that there are good things in the arts world. It is far more difficult for me to give credibility to what he says and to what the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central says if they do not pay some tribute to the good things that are happening.

The hon. Member for Paisley, South must understand that the policy that he is adopting towards the Arts Council, which has been supported by successive Governments, would undermine it and the principle of the arm's length policy. If the hon. Gentleman were Minister with responsibility for the arts, he would increasingly take decisions about the disposal of funds. That would mean more centralisation.

I must also consider the difference in approach and philosophy towards the public and private sectors. The hon. Member for Paisley, South believes that arts funding should be done by the state, whereas I believe that there should be a partnership between the state and the private sector. With the right framework, tax measures and encouragement — not just sponsorship, the Budget and the receipts policy for museums — we shall create an environment in which the private sector can play a much more positive role in increasing funding for the arts. That is what we all want, but we differ in our philosophy and approach. The hon. Gentleman believes that the state should do everything, whereas I believe that the strength of the arts is in its diversity. It has become evident during this excellent, admirable debate in which many hon. Members have participated that our approach is different in that respect, and the Government feel strongly about it.

It being half past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Film and Television Industry (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): As we have debated the arts all morning it seemed timely to have an Adjournment debate on the film and television industry in Scotland. In many ways television and film as media bring the possibility of museums, galleries, theatre, ballet and opera into the living room for the majority of the population. Indeed, in some respects they encourage attendance at them.

When I applied for the debate I entitled it, "Expanding the film and television industry in Scotland", but somehow the "expanding" got lost on the Order Paper. I mention that because someone asked me whether there was a film and television industry in Scotland. There is commercial ITV, BBC Scotland and the independent sector, which has been a growing segment of the industry. It is essential that in future years the reply should not be, "There was an industry, but it has gone."

Scotland has had a tradition of documentary film making since the 1930s with the work of Dr. John Grierson who subsequently left for Canada but returned to Scotland in later life. The Scottish Film Council has already celebrated more than half a century of existence. I was pleased to note that Charles Oakley, a founder of that council, was this week given an honorary doctorate. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) worked with the council, although I doubt whether he was even a twinkle in his parents' eye when it was set up in 1934.

The film and television work in Scotland is both recognisable and capable of greater creative and technical achievement. It has talent which wants to work in Scotland and with that ability to look beyond Scotland. I understand that at present the talent in the independent sector is working at only half capacity.

The film work of Bill Forsyth readily comes to mind, and includes "Gregory's Girl", "Local Hero" and "Comfort and Joy". I must confess a special liking for "That Sinking Feeling" which also included scenes shot in the Maryhill area. Charles Gormley's film "Heavenly Pursuits" was Channel 4's main entry to this year's Cannes film festival.

The independent sector is growing, and there are possibilities for ITV production in Scotland, and for BBC Scotland, if it were given its head. This year the Scottish Trades Union Congress at Aberdeen had a motion from the Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians introduced its general secretary Alan Sapper and seconded by the Scottish actor Phil McColl. It called for the generation of major new funding to underpin film and television development in Scotland.

I do not know whether the Minister is aware of subsequent STUC general council follow-up on the development of the industry. Ministers constantly talk about growth in the service sector. No doubt they do so in order to make up for the tremendous contraction in manufacturing capacity. At one time film production was regarded as part of the manufacturing sector, but in more recent times it has been linked with the service sector.

This branch of entertainment may not be a substantial employer although it is a significant employer as well as being a good overseas earner. If Scotland was used more often as the location for productions, it might give a significant boost to the local economies.

On 25 March 1986 the Independent Programme Producers Association in Scotland gave a presentation in the House. Robin Crichton, the chairman, and John McGrath, the vice chairman, spoke about the problems of access to broadcast television outlets in Scotland, including Channel 4 which is at present the sole domestic outlet.

I said on Second Reading of the Bill setting up Channel 4 that > "One of the strengths of ITV 1 was that it has been able to take account of regional distinctiveness . . . in various parts of the United Kingdom." — [Official Report, 18 February 1980; Vol. 979, c. 118-119.]

I was keen that Channel 4 should not be seen as some monolithic enterprise and that it should encourage existing Scottish commercial companies, such as STV, Grampian or Border, which has one leg in Scotland and the other in the north of England, to make a bigger contribution to the ITV network, including Channel 4. Although Channel 4 has opened up possibilities, because well over 10 per cent. of its audience is in Scotland, independent producers complain that they had only 12 hours, or 1·5 per cent., of Channel 4's total production time last year. They contrast their case with what goes on in Wales. There is a marked difference, although the existence of the Welsh channel makes the comparison less straightforward than it might seem.

When the chief executive of Channel 4 opened Picardy Pictures, an independent broadcast facility based in Edinburgh, at the beginning of the year, he said that some £50 million had been commissioned in the independent sector last year. He was quoted in The Scotsman of 31 January 1986 as saying that > "We would like to spend a proper proportion of that amount in Scotland."

He made the point that he commissioned solely on merit. I concur with doing that. However, we must try to remove some of the obstacles that prevent a better and fairer spread of productions throughout the United Kingdom.

The film-making industry is largely based in and around London. However, Scotland has the largest number of independent producers working outside the metropolis. Indeed, there is a need to develop post-production facilities so that there is less reliance on London. There is also a considerable video market potential. Many firms are concerned to brush up their corporate images and to promote their public relations. It would be interesting to know whether the Scottish Office, and even the Scottish Development Agency and some of the other public bodies in Scotland are still having to send much of their promotional and advertising work to London. Even lawyers' work—and I know that this will please the Minister—could be done in Scotland, and contracts could be drawn up in Scots law, although I accept that there may be a shortage of media law specialists.

I mentioned scope for ITV and BBC. Indeed, STV put up half of the finance for "Gregory's Girl". The series "Held in Trust" must surely have given Scottish tourism a boost. Grampian with its series on oil, commissioned for Channel 4 and co-produced with Norwegian television, provides another example of what can be done in Scotland. It was something of an indictment that it took Harlech television and a German co-production team to screen Robert Louis Stevenson's "Kidnapped", with a German actor in such a self-evident Scottish story.

Currently, we are awaiting the Peacock report. It would be disastrous if the BBC was in any way reliant on advertising. We heard about some of the problems of sponsorship of the arts during the previous debate, and it would be damaging if the unique reputation of public service broadcasting were to be eroded. It would also not be good for the commercial sector.

Since the lobby in March, meetings have been held with ITV and IPPA, which have resulted in the setting-up of a working party under the aegis of the SDA to examine ways in which broadcast productions might be rationalised and integrated to a greater extent. It is examining the possibility of establishing a Scottish screen commission that could act as a distributor marketing overseas Scottish facilities, technicians and locations to attract inward investment. It could also operate as a production fund to top up investment in Scottish production to enable producers to retain their distribution rights and maximise potential overseas sales.

The various sectors of the industry in Scotland would, of course, retain their independence and individuality. A Scottish screen commission would give sufficient strength and stature to maximise the opportunities offered by the new international markets that are emerging and are likely to emerge in the 1990s.

The attraction of such a commission, if it can be proved economically feasible, is that it will bring together the various sides of the industry and the financiers, so that they can move towards a better base to exploit the opportunities offered by expanding markets and technologies, as well as marketing Scotland internationally. I understand that the working party includes Alistair Hetherington as chairman, Bill Brown of STV, Justin Dukes of Channel 4, Alex Mair of Grampian, and may be joined by Jim Graham of Border. The SDA will provide the business development role.

Robert Crichton, the chairman of IPPA in Scotland, has been in touch with the Secretary of State. I have a copy of a letter from the right hon. Gentleman's Private Secretary to Mr. Crichton, stating:

"Mr. Rifkind has read the paper with much interest and is sure that it will prove a useful basis for discussions with the Scottish Film Council and the Scottish Development Agency."

That typifies the right hon. Gentleman's skills of advocacy. I hope that today the Minister will assure us that there is positive Government backing for the initiative.

The role of the Scottish Film Council is very important. Recently I talked to its assistant director, John Brown, about the work of the Scottish Training Trust — something that has been praised in a number of quarters —and the Scottish Film Production Board, which is a useful form of funding. However, it deals with limited finance even though the Fund is now supported by the Scottish Arts Council and Channel 4.

The Minister may be aware that cinema attendances in Scotland are proportionately higher than for the United Kingdom as a whole. No doubt he will wish to comment on educational broadcasting, in which the council plays its role, and where there have been a number of significant improvements.

When referring to a Scottish screen commission, I do not mean Holywood spectaculars that can fall flat on their faces. Indeed, Charlotte square — the home of many finance companies and merchant banks in Edinburgh— contributes quite a lot through investment packages towards the success of both British and American films.

It would be useful to achieve greater interest and support for low budget and thus low risk film production in Scotland. I do not know whether the Minister saw any of the series of Australian films shown on television here. but that comparatively new film industry received a considerable boost when the former Australian Prime Minister on a visit to the United States saw that an Australian film had actually made Time magazine. Mrs. Thatcher is a liberal by comparison with that former Australian Prime Minister, but when he went back he ensured that his country's industry received a boost.

I am disappointed in a sense that the Minister with responsibility for industry and education in Scotland cannot be here as I gather that he has had informal talks on the subject, but the Minister with responsibility for local government and environment is the duty Minister today and will doubtless pass on all that has been said — I thought at first that it was because he missed my keeping him on his toes when I was Opposition spokesman on Scottish affairs and felt the need to come back for more.

I hope that in reading his Scottish Office brief today he will give political support to the concept of a Scottish screen commission which is so necessary and let the forces of autosuggestion get to work at the Scottish Office. I do not mind if the Secretary of State comes along in three months or six months with this brilliant idea and says that he is all for it because I believe that it will be very good for the industry.

The Government White Paper on film policy, Cmnd. 9319 published in July 1984, stated:

"A film industry can be a matter of great national pride. And through its ability to project the national culture . . . it can thus enhance a country's international standing."

Encouraging and facilitating the film and television industry in Scotland could produce considerable spin-off opportunities for the economy, opening up new opportunities in other spheres.

The Minister should be aware of some of the fresh inspiration that came into the industry in Scotland following the conference on Cinema in a small country held in Edinburgh more than a decade ago. We now need the political imagination to encourage and facilitate that which already exists and go on to achieve much more in this area of entertainment, employment, culture and education. As I said at the beginning, the industry's output is an immense part of our culture and education and has a broad appeal which I hope the Government will encourage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) on raising this important issue today. I listened carefully to his speech, especially the part in which he became an adherent of the principle of auto-suggestion, a subject about which we shall no doubt hear more from him in the future.

It is timely to debate the film and television industry in Scotland, when so many exciting developments have taken place or are in prospect. Before dealing with the specific issues raised by the hon. Gentleman, I should place on record the Government's continuing support for the development and growth of a healthy and viable commercial film sector in Scotland and the continued development of broadcasting provision geared to the needs of the community.

Perhaps one of the most striking examples of the growth in confidence and enterprise in Scotland in recent years has been the emergence of a dynamic film industry with a distinctive style and the capacity to achieve box-office success. Not so long ago mention of Scottish films would have conjured up images of "Brigadoon" or "Whisky Galore", or of tartan westerns featuring Rob Roy and Bonnie Prince Charlie. Then, as the hon. Gentleman said, Bill Forsyth came along and demonstrated that good movies can be made by Scots, about Scots, in Scotland. The triumphs of "Gregory's Girl" and "Local Hero" have been followed by a series of low budget productions which show that Scottish film-makers are a force with which to be reckoned. Among the more notable recent successes are "Living Apart Together", "Restless Natives" and "The Girl in the Picture". They are only the tip of an expanding iceberg.

The Government's view is that the prospects for the industry will ultimately depend upon the efforts of all those who work in it and on the industry's ability to produce good quality films that people want to see.

One of the primary objectives of the Films Act was to rid the industry, and cinemas in particular, of unnecessary Government burdens and to help lay the foundations for the development of an industry which is free to make decisions on the basis of its own commericial interests. So, in May 1985 the Eady levy on cinemas was abolished and the legislative basis for domestic film quota was removed, along with the requirement for cinemas to be licensed.

The abolition of the Eady levy led the Government to re-assess the valuable investment role played by the National Film Finance Corporation in encouraging newly merging British talent. That role has been taken over and enhanced by the new private sector body, British Screen Finance Ltd. to which the Government are to contribute £2 million a year for the next five years. BSF began its operations in January this year and has already committed funds to a number of projects.

The Government's financial support for the industry is not limited to their contribution to BSF. Substantial sums are made available to the British Film Institute, to the Scottish Film Council and to the National Film and Television school. In addition, the Government contributed £325,000 to British film year, the success of which was, by all accounts, most encouraging.

Following a seemingly inexorable decline, cinema admissions have shown a marked increase, accompanied by a substantial refurbishment and new development in the exhibition sector. We hope that an industry, now freed from anachronstic Government burdens will be able to build upon these foundations.

The Scottish Film industry has felt the need, since the late 1970s, for the creation of an investment fund to provide Scottish film makers with the opportunity to raise a substantial proportion of feature film production costs north of the border. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that in particular.

While the Scottish film production fund has been able to make a small contribution in this area, a much larger fund, backed by the commercial sector, would be required to meet the aspirations of would-be Scottish film producers. An initiative has recently been taken by IPPA, as the hon. Member said, which is proposing the establishment of a Scottish screen commission to fill that funding gap. The IPPA has entered into a dialogue with the Scottish Development Agency and the Scottish Film Council about this proposal and on the promotion of Scotland generally as a film centre.

The hon. Gentleman asked for the Government's reaction. I welcome the initiative by IPPA, which is designed to stimulate the growth and development of the Scottish film industry in general.

I hope that the discussions that have begun with the Scottish Development Agency and the Scottish Film Council, the broadcasting companies and other interested bodies will bear fruit. I am sure that the proposal will be supported by film-makers in Scotland, and that they will take advantage of the new opportunities which I hope will flow from the establishment of a commission or similar body that might emerge from the consultation.

Scottish education department officials have already participated in discussions involving IPPA, the SDA and the SFC and will, of course, be keeping in close touch with the progress of the proposal. I am sure that the agency and the film council will offer whatever assistance and expertise that they can in taking the proposal forward.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the concern expressed by Scottish members of the Independent Programme Producers Association that the amount of independently produced broadcast material utilised by the ITV companies is relatively low. In particular, the IPPA is concerned about the low level of broadcast material currently being commissioned from Scottish sources by Channel 4, and it is seeking increased access for its programmes on public television. I understand that the IPPA has received some support from Scottish Television, with both organisations stressing that sufficient work should come to Scotland to stimulate creative talent and innovation.

I believe that in Scotland, with a population of just over 5 million, we are well provided with three and a half television companies serving our needs—BBC Scotland, STV, Grampian and a bit of Border—all of which produce high quality broadcast material. In addition, the independent programme and film producers make a valuable contribution to the excellent Scottish Television spectrum. I would welcome any increase in Scottish produced broadcast material, either by the larger television companies or by the independent programme or film producers. I would not think it proper—I rather gather that from the hon. Gentleman that he would not either—to try to coerce national television companies to accept a higher proportion of Scottish produced material by setting quotas of commissioned material based either on funding contributions to organisations such as Channel 4 or on the percentage of audience in a particular area.

Indeed, the Government have no locus to arbitrate in such matters, which have properly been delegated to the responsible broadcasting authorities. In fact, a certain element of regulation already exists to ensure that a proper proportion—at least 86 per cent. of material shown on ITV and Channel 4—is of British origin. I think that it would be quite wrong to introduce further regulation to provide an artificial market for Scottish film and programme makers. I believe that, as commercial companies, IPPA's Scottish members and the Scottish television companies should be prepared to take their position in the United Kingdom market place. Their success in attracting funds from Channel 4, STV and other sources must depend on their ability to deliver the sort of product that the television companies and the public want.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point that until recently the major inhibition on independent film and television production in Scotland has been the lack of adequate facilities. The problems have been especially acute for those television and film productions which depend on the use of studios. This is an area where the Government have been able to offer direct help.

The Government's review of the regional incentive package of assistance available to industry in the United Kingdom identified clearly the role that the service sector now occupies within the United Kingdom economy. In November 1984, when we introduced changes in the incentive package, we sought to encourage service industry growth by widening the scope of the new regional development grant scheme. Consequently, the companies in Scotland in the film and television industry that are situated in the development areas can now benefit from the help of regional development grants that are aimed at encouraging job-creating investment. Moreover, the industry can also benefit from regional selective assistance, which, as before, remains open to both the manufacturing and service sectors of industry. Already the industry is becoming alive to this extra help that is available to it, and in the past 18 months my Department has offered nearly £1·5 million to the industry within Scotland. A further £150,000 has been provided recently through the SDA, which is considering a further major loan amounting to £1·7 million. The assistance is there to overcome that particular hurdle.

One of the most important ways in which the Government have supported the growth of the Scottish film industry in recent years has been through the Scottish film production fund. The resources at the disposal of the fund are modest and they are about £150,000 in the current year. Nevertheless, the fund has consistently shown how much can be achieved by the injection of quite small sums at critical periods in the development of a production. In the fund's first four years of operation a total of 64 projects have been assisted in this way. The list of its successes is impressive, ranging from Channel 4 documentaries such as "The Work They Say is Mine"—the role of women in Shetland communities—to full-length feature films such as "Girl in the Picture" and "Restless Natives". It is interesting and encouraging to note that a high proportion of projects started by the fund involve women film-makers. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that.

It is not possible in a short debate of this sort to respond in detail to all the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. I hope, however, that he will recognise from what I have said that the Government attach considerable importance to the development and maintenace of a thriving film and television industry in Scotland. There are healthy signs in the continuing dialogue involving the main interest groups. I hope that all those involved will capitalise on what has already been achieved and co-operate to ensure the future of the industry. The Government will continue to play their part——

The Question having been proposed at half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 9 June 1986

HOME DEPARTMENT

News International, Wapping

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department where Assistant Commissioner Wynn Jones was stationed on the night of 3 May at Wapping at 10 pm, 10.30 pm, 11 pm, 11.30 pm, midnight and 12.30 am; what are Assistant Commissioner Jones' salary and allowances; who was in command of the mounted police that night; which officers were in charge of the riot police that night; and which officer gave the instruction that the crowd was not allowed over a period of hours to leave Wellclose Street and Wellclose Square that night.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that Deputy Assistant Commissioner Jones was present in the control room at Leman street police station throughout the evening of 3 May and until after 2 am on 4 May.

Chief Superintendent Goodall was the officer in overall command of mounted police and officers deployed in protective uniform that evening. The commissioner assures me that no instructions were given to prevent demonstrators leaving Wellclose street and Wellclose square. The annual salary of a Deputy Assistant Commissioner is £32,352, inclusive of London weighting and London allowance.

Truncheons (Use)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances police are allowed to use truncheons; and which parts of the body they are allowed to hit with truncheons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A police officer may use reasonable force to defend himself from attack and to exercise a lawful power. Decisions on the use of force including the use of truncheons, are operational matters for decision according to the circumstances which the officers face. Chief officers have issued guidance that truncheons should be used to the minimum extent necessary in the circumstances and should not be aimed at the head.

Prison Workshops

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy towards prison workshops; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mellor: I would refer my hon. and learned Friend to the reply given to a Question by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. David Atkinson) on 25 March at columns 408-9.

Prison Department (Industrial Officers)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what categories of job are performed by the 3,000 industrial officers working in the prison department.

Mr. Mellor: The job categories of industrial staff now employed in the prison department are—drivers, works craftsmen (painters, carpenters, etc.), labourers, stokers, plant attendants, caretakers, cleaners, caterers, farm foremen, agricultural craftsmen, mechanics, fitters, storekeepers, packers, stores inspectors, and car park attendants.

Durham Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department of the prisoners currently in H wing in Durham prison, what is the length of stay of the prisoner who has been there the longest.

Mr. Mellor: Eleven and a half years.

Coventry (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Coventry.

Mr. Hurd: On 30 May I visited the West Midlands fire brigade, including its training centre at Coventry. This and other aspects of my visit gave me a valuable insight into its work.

Riots (Compensation)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many claims were made against the Merseyside police for compensation following the Toxteth riots in 1981; how many were settled; and how many are still pending;

(2) how many claims for compensation are still outstanding arising from the riots in 1981 in Toxteth, Brixton, Moss Side and Bristol at the latest date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I assume that the hon. Member has in mind claims for compensation under the Riot (Damages) Act 1886. Responsibility for receiving and considering claims under the Act rests with the local compensation authority. The Home Office is not involved and no central record of claims is kept. I understand from the Receiver, who is the compensation authority for the Metropolitan police district, that eight claims under the 1886 Act arising from the Brixton disturbances in 1981 have not been finally settled.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were injured by the use of CS canisters during the Toxteth riots in 1981; and how many persons then made claims for damages.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Merseyside that five people were injured as a result of the police use of 'Ferret' CS cartridges during the disturbances in Toxteth on 6 July 1981. Four of these people have made claims for damages against the chief constable.

Prisoners (Visitors' Costs)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost to his Department over the last full year for which figures are available for paying travel and hotel bills for the wives and families of inmates in Her Majesty's prisons to visit; what are the comparable figures for the previous 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The provisional figure for payments made under the assisted visits scheme for the year 1985-86 is £818,283. This includes £40,139 expenditure incurred by the Department of Health and Social Security during 1984-85, but not reimbursed by the Home Office until 1985-86. For expenditure in earlier years, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a Question by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 24 March at columns 338 and 339.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy as concerns the allocation of rail travel warrants for the wives or husbands and families of inmates in Her Majesty's prisons; in what circumstances first class travel is allowed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The Department of Health and Social Security administers the assisted visits scheme on behalf of the Home Office. I understand from that Department that where a visitor who is eligible for assistance under the scheme travels by rail the fare is usually paid by means of a rail travel warrant, validated for second class travel only. I understand that it is not practice to allow first class travel.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his reply of 3 June, Official Report, column 449, if he will give details of the three payments from departmental funds in the past 12 months made in respect of fixed penalties imposed for parking fines.

Mr. Hurd: Two of the three payments arose in respect of fixed penalty notices incurred by Home Office official cars parked in controlled zones in the course of official business, in one instance while the driver escorted visitors to a meeting in a Home Office building, and in the other, while awaiting the departure of a senior Home Office official from a meeting. The third instance involved the private car of a departmental board member who parked in a controlled zone while attending a meeting in a Home Office building, having been unable readily to gain access to an official car park. In all three cases, there were extenuating circumstances which were considered, exceptionally, to justify meeting the cost from public funds. The total cost involved was £30.

The Media (War Time Role)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the reply of 3 June, in what form he expects the House to be asked to consider proposals from Her Majesty's Government on the role of the media in time of war.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence published proposals on the role of the media in war in Cmnd. 9499, presented to Parliament on 24 April 1985.

Dover Castle

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the reasons why it was necessary to erect a communications mast in the grounds of Dover castle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to his question on 25 February at column 486. The mast was provided for the former communications centre.

Prison Service (Garages)

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many garages belonging to Her Majesty's prison service have been sold to members of the public in each year since 1979; and how many of these were sold in Leicester.

Mr. Mellor: Detailed information on the number of garages sold could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. None has been sold in Leicester.

Peace Convoy

Mr. Malins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned about the number of people connected with the peace convoy who have been arrested under section 25(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constables of Avon and Somerset, Dorset, Hampshire and Wiltshire have informed me that of those people connected with the peace convoy who were arrested from 17 May to 5 June, 26 were arrested under section 25(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Population-Police Ratio

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the ratio of population in Portsmouth and Hampshire to the number of police; how this compares with the rest of England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of Hampshire that the population per police officer in these areas is as follows:

	Ratio
Portsmouth (comprising Portsmouth Central, Cosham, Fratton and Southsea sub-divisions)	1:495
Hampshire	1:536

For information about ratios in the rest of England, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) on 27 February 1986 at columns 655-58, which set out the ratio of population to police officer for each police force in England and Wales on 31 December 1985.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were recruited by the Hampshire, West Sussex, Dorset, Surrey and Berkshire county police forces, respectively, in the years 1975 to 1980 and 1980 to 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information is as follows:

Weapon Offences

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences were recorded for each year since 1979 involving (a) any firearm, (b) crossbows and (c) air rifles.

Mr. Mellor: The available information relates to notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used and is published annually in chapter 3 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales"—table 3·2 of the issue for 1984, Cmnd 9621. In 1984 there were 8,376 such offences and in 5,540 cases an air weapon was reported to have been involved. Information is not collected separately on air rifles which are included amongst all air-weapons. Information on the use of crossbows in crime is not recorded centrally.

Refugees (Hong Kong)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on his admission policy for refugees from Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: [pursuant to his reply, 23 May 1986, c. 337]: None since October 1985 when the High Commissioner, addressing his Executive Committee, warmly welcomed the Government's response to the report of the Home Affairs Committee on Refugees and Asylum with Special Reference to the Vietnamese. He described the measures we have taken to admit further Vietnamese by relaxing the family reunion criteria as "an important new effort to help relieve the burden of Hong Kong".

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Car Parking (Norman Shaw Building)

27. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to ensure that car parking spaces at the Norman Shaw building designated for right hon. and hon. Members are not used by others.

Mr. Biffen: The security staff do their best to ensure that the 14 car parking spaces at the Norman Shaw building are used by Members, or by any Palace of Westminster photographic pass holders acting on their behalf who must be in possession of the appropriate Member's car parking permit.

House Catering Facilities (Summer)

28. Mr. Speller asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to make available a catering service to the members of the public visiting the House during the months of the summer adjournment; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: I have been asked to reply.

The Catering Sub-Committee has no proposals to change present arrangements.

Palace of Westminster (Employment of Foreign Nationals)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal if vetting is carried out for persons of foreign nationality who seek to obtain employment, paid or unpaid, as secretaries or research assistants to hon. Members in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: It is not the practice to give detailed information about security matters.

Members' Research Assistants

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many approved research assistants are employed by hon. Members; how many are British; how many are foreigners; and how many receive payment from the Fees Office from hon. Members' secretarial allowances.

Mr. Biffen: A total of 518 research assistants currently hold either temporary or full Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes. Of these, 408 are British nationals and 110 are foreigners. Eighty-one receive payment through the Fees Office from Members' allowances.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many hon. Members have more than two research assistants; and if he will list these Members in the Official Report, indicating the number of such assistants who are paid from the official sources on the instructions of hon. Members relating to the secretarial allowance.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Palace of Westminster (Passes)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many persons have been granted short-term passes for entry into the Palace of Westminster as secretaries or research assistants in the last year for which figures are available; and how many of these are of foreign nationality.

Mr. Biffen: A total of 943 temporary Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes have been issued for Members' secretaries or research assistants since September 1985, the earliest date that records are available. Of these, 473 have been issued to foreign nationals.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many persons of United States nationality are holders of permanent or temporary passes as research assistants to hon. Members in the Palace of Westminster; how many are unpaid; and what information he has as to means of recruitment.

Mr. Biffen: Eighty-nine persons of United States nationality currently hold temporary or full Palace of Westminster photo-identity passes. None of these receives payment through the Fees Office from Members' allowances; Members have individual responsibility for the recruitment and conditions of service of their staff, and no other records are kept on how or if they are paid.

Northern Ireland Assembly Publications

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Lord Privy Seal why there is a delay in Northern Ireland Assembly publications being available in the Vote Office; what steps are being taken to alleviate the problem; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: There is no delay in the delivery of the Official Report of the Northern Ireland Assembly, which is the only Assembly publication regularly made available in the Vote Office.

Norman Shaw North Issue Office

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Lord Privy Seal when he expects the Services Committee to report on the opening hours of the Norman Shaw North issue office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: This matter has been referred in the first instance to the Library Sub-Committee; and I understand that the Sub-Committee will be considering it in the next few weeks. Its conclusions will be placed before the full Services Committee as soon as possible thereafter. Any proposals entailing increased expenditure on the House of Commons (Administration) Vote would also require the approval of the House of Commons Commission.

Members and Staff (Stationery)

Mr. Hancock asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will consider introducing 100 per cent. recycled stationery paper and envelopes for the use of hon. Members and staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The Services Committee decided in February 1982 that available papers, containing recycled waste, were not acceptable for Members' stationery. Since then HMSO has reveiwed regularly the available paper containing waste, but has not yet discovered any of a quality superior to that previously rejected by the Committee.

Palace of Westminster (Photocopiers)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many photocopiers are in use in the Palace of Westminster; what was the maintenance costs for these machines in each of the years 1980 to 1985; and what is the latest estimate for 1986.

Mr. Biffen: There are 74 photocopying machines in use in the House of Commons and parliamentary outbuildings. Hire charges, which include engineering maintenance and consumables other than paper, for the years in question are as follows:

1981-82	132,000
1982-83	128,000
1983-84	157,000
1984-85	197,000
1985-86	224,000
*1986-87	233,000

* Estimated

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how much money was received from right hon. and hon. Members who photocopied documents in excess of the permitted number on the photocopiers provided in the Palace of Westminster in each of the years 1980 to 1985; and what is the latest figure for 1986.

Mr. Biffen: The total sums received by the Fees Office in respect of photocopied documents in excess of the permitted number on photocopying machines provided in the Palace of Westminster and parliamentary outbuildings for the years in question are as follows:

Financial year	£
1981-82	301·56
1982-83	163·40
1983-84	243·98
1984-85	22·56
1985-86	46·90
*1986-87	31·50

* To date.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to monitor the use of House of Commons notepaper by foreign research assistants using the official photocopiers in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Biffen: No, but the authorities of the House will continue to investigate any allegations of improper use of either the photocopying machines or House of Commons stationery, which are drawn to their attention.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal what was the cost of providing copying paper for the photocopying machines in the Palace of Westminster in each of the years 1980 to 1985; and what is the latest estimate for 1986.

Mr. Biffen: I shall reply as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Funding

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the recurrent grant for (a) each of the eight Scottish universities and (b) all eight universities in each of the last five years (i) in cash terms and (ii) in constant terms; and if he will express these sums as a percentage of the recurrent grant paid to all universities in Great Britain in each of these years.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

The figures are not comparable from year to year because of various changes in funding arrangements; most notably adjustments made to reflect changes in the level of the home undergraduate tuition fee, provision for redundancy and restructuring costs and for new initiatives such as the information technology and new blood programmes.

Postgraduate Studentships (EEC Nationals)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what regulations govern EEC nationals who wish to apply for postgraduate studentships in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Walden: Postgraduate awards made by my Department or by the British Academy are governed by the State Award Regulations 1978 (as amended). Awards made by the five research councils or by local education authorities are governed by the Education (Fees and Awards) Regulations 1983 (as amended).

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what difference there is between the treatment of EEC nationals living in the United Kingdom and British subjects so far as the award of postgraduate studentships is concerned.

Mr. Walden: None.

Remuneration of Teachers Act

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any recent representations seeking the amendment or repeal of the Remuneration of Teachers Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The most recent representation received on this subject was from the local authority associations in a letter dated 3 February 1986, which argued for the repeal of the RTA to allow the creation of new negotiating machinery linking teachers' pay with other conditions of service. The issue is currently under consideration in the talks at ACAS between management and unions.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Chris Patten: My Department has made applications to the Data Protection Registrar covering a total of 20 separate database operations. These have been grouped as eight part A applications with a total registration fee of £176. Four members of staff are currently involved to a significant extent with implementation of the legislation: the proportion of their time involved represents about the equivalent of one half of one full-time staff member.

In a full year the cost to the Department will be approximately £10,000 (including the registration fee). This sum represents mainly the annual basic costs of the staff mentioned; further costs cannot be assessed at present with any accuracy but are likely to be minimal in that the Department's data handling procedures are already broadly in line with the data protection principles.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the cost of the Medical Research Council in each of the past four years.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council receives the greater part of its income as an annual grant-in-aid from the Department's science budget. The amounts of that grant-in-aid in each of the past four years are as follows:

Financial Year	£ million Cash Terms
1983-84	113·7
1984-85	117·2
1985-86	*122·3
1986-87	*128·3

* Estimated.

In addition, the MRC has a small amount of income for research commissioned by other Government Departments, international organisations and industry. Such income is approximately 5 per cent. of the grant-in-aid.

Science Budget

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Salisbury of 11 April, Official Report, column 201, when he now expects to publish Her Majesty's Government's response to the July 1985 report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee on the future of the science budget.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend hopes to respond to the report before the summer recess.

Teacher Training

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to consult the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education with regard to the future of initial teacher training at Portsmouth polytechnic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science from which institutions and validating bodies he received advice before making his provisional decision to end initial teacher training at Portsmouth polytechnic and Humberside college.

Mr. Chris Patten: All institutions providing initial teacher training and their validating bodies were amongst those who advised my right hon. Friend before he made his provisional decisions on intakes to public sector initial teacher training courses for 1987-89.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received to date with regard to his provisional decision to end teacher training at Portsmouth polytechnic.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has received seven letters from hon. Members and members of the public.

Schools (Statistics)

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools in England are (a) county, (b) voluntary controlled and (c) voluntary aided.

Mr. Dunn: In England, in January 1985, there were 16,356 county schools, 3,207 voluntary controlled and 4,553 voluntary aided schools.

University Funding

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the percentage change in the funding of each university by the University Grants Committee between 1980-81 and 1986-87, excluding those amounts representing compensation for changes in home student fees, for redundancy and for early retirement, changes to take account of minor capital works from the recurrent grant, changes in the level of local authority rates and additions made for the information technology and new blood programmes.

(2) what is the percentage change in real terms, measured by the gross domestic product deflator, in the funding of each university by the University Grants Committee between 1980-81 and 1986-87, excluding those amounts representing compensation for changes in home student fees, compensation for redundancy and early retirement, changes to take account of minor capital works from the recurrent grant and changes in the level of local authority rates (a) including and (b) excluding additions made for the information technology and new blood programmes.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1986, c. 480.]: The percentage changes in the funding of each university by the University Grants Committee in its basic recurrent and equipment grants between 1980-81 and 1986-87, excluding those amounts representing compensation for changes in the level of home student fees, compensation for redundancy and early retirement, provision for capital in recurrent expenditure, local authority rates and additions made for information technology and new blood programmes is given in column (a). Columns (b) and (c) gives the comparable percentage figures in real terms measured by the GDP deflator (b) including and (c) excluding additions made for information technology and new blood posts. The percentage changes shown will be in part the consequence of the withdrawal of the overseas student subsidy and to the extent that these losses have been made up by increased fee income will not accurately reflect the changes in the universities' financial position.

ENVIRONMENT

Faslane

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum the Property Services Agency plans to spend at the Faslane base on roads, jetties and other infrastructure in each of the next 10 years.

Sir George Young: Spending on roads, jetties and similar infrastructure items currently planned to provide access to the construction sites at the Clyde submarine base at Faslane and the armament depot at Coulport, is expected to total some £29 million. The spread of expenditure is expected to be restricted to five years and be of the order shown below.

Prior years	0·5
1986-87	12·0
1987-88	14·5
1988-89	1·5
1989-90	0·5

Palace of Westminster (Underground Pedestrian Approach)

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for the Environment who now has responsibility for maintaining the underground pedestrian approach to the Palace of Westminster; and whether he has any proposals for improving its hygiene, appearance and safety.

Sir George Young: The maintenance of the pedestrian subway under Bridge street is, since the abolition of the GLC, the sole responsibility of Westminster city council.

Day to day maintenance currently consists of an early morning clean and additional afternoon sweeping. Performance of this task is kept under review in regular meetings between the Council and the Property Services Agency.

Rates and Precepts

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the operation of the recently introduced consultation procedures which precede the making of local rates and precepts.

Mrs. Rumbold: The duty on local authorities to consult representatives of industrial and commercial ratepayers before setting their rates and precepts has been in operation for two years. Experience in the first year suggested that, although there had been difficulties in some areas, local authorities were now generally much more aware of the problems and needs of their business ratepayers. We shall shortly be seeking views on the experience of the second year.

St. Vincent House

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for what period of time the lease between the Property Services Agency and the London Residuary Body for the office space in St. Vincent house is valid; how much will be paid yearly by the London Residuary Body in rent for the five years after April 1987; what is the square footage of the office space rented; what is the total cost per year to the Property Services Agency of maintaining St. Vincent house; and what options are available in the lease for extending the time of the lease or the area of office space.

Sir George Young: The London Residuary Body is occupaying some 5,389 sq ft of St. Vicent house. The terms of lease for its occupation have not yet been finalised. I expect this matter will be concluded shortly. It is not normally the practice, for reasons of commercial confidentiality, to disclose the terms of such agreements.

Local Government Reform (Ex Gratia Payments)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue guidelines to local authorities regarding the circumstances in which ex gratia payments should be made in connection with the abolition of the Greater London council and as to the amounts involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The making of ex gratia payments to local authority staff is a matter for individual local authorities in the light of their own pay agreements.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked. the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Ridley: My Deprtment has made 13 registrations. One person has implementation as a significant part of his job description. I cannot yet estimate the cost of conforming with the eight principles.

Gravel Extraction (Ouse Valley)

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many plannning appeals he is currently considering in relation to the extraction of gravel in the Ouse Valley in Bedfordshire.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend is currently considering one planning appeal relating to the extraction of gravel in the Ouse valley in Bedfordshire. This is for an extension to Radwell quarry at Moor End, near Bedford. The public local inquiry opens on 10 June. I will let my hon. Friend know the result in due course.

Toxteth Riots (Compensation)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what body is now dealing with compensation claims arising from the riots at Toxteth in 1981 and 1985.

Mr. John Patten: The Merseyside Residuary Body is the body now dealing with compensation claims arising from the riots at Toxteth in 1981 and 1985.

Radiation

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which part of the United Kingdom recorded the highest levels of radiation following the Chernobyl incident.

Mrs. Rumbold: The highest levels of radiation reported to the NRPB were in Cumbria and north Wales on Saturday 3 May 1986.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 21 May, Official Report, column 202, if he will make a statement on the individual matters discussed at his meeting with the chairmen of the residuary bodies on 30 May.

Mr. Tracey: Meetings with the residuary body chairman such as that held on 30 May are held periodically to discuss matters concerning the residuary bodies' functions in general. These include staff property, finance and progress towards wind up.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the total number of staff employed by the London waste regulation authority and the seven waste disposal authorities in Greater London and the total number of staff previously employed by the Greater London council on waste disposal.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that the London Waste Regulation Authority at present directly employs some 79 staff. Similar information for the four statutory waste authorities and 12 London boroughs responsible for waste disposal is not available centrally. I understand that the GLC employed around 900 staff on waste regulation and disposal. Further information will be sought in due course through the joint manpower watch.

Sport and Recreation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the Central Council for Physical Recreation concerning the future of sport and recreation in the major conurbations following abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Tracey: One. The chairman of the CCPR wrote to the Prime Minister on 23 October 1984.

Planning (Greater London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an account of the relationship between the London and South East Regional Planning Conference, the London Planning Advisory Committee and his Department in terms of planning work in Greater London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The responsibility for providing strategic planning guidance in Greater London rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. He will be seeking the advice of the London Planning Advisory Committee, the London and South East Regional Planning Conference and other bodies on the scope and content of that guidance. The advice will be framed within the context provided by the strategic guidance for London and the South East, which was issued in draft by the Secretary of State on 27 February 1986 in response to a regional statement prepared by the London and South East Regional Planning Conference.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will inform Humberside county council and Glanford borough council of the name of the company to be employed in the test drilling of the possible nuclear waste site at South Killingholme; and if he will announce when test drilling will commence.

Mrs. Rumbold: The geo-technical consultants appointed by NIREX to supervise the investigations of the South Killingholme site are Howard Humphreys. The sub-contractor who will carry out the test drilling has not yet been appointed. Drilling could not start until 7 July when the special development order permitting geological investigations comes into operation. After that it is a matter for NIREX and the contractors to decide when drilling should begin. I will arrange for a copy of this answer to be sent to the two councils.

Business Rates

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of the impact of increased rates on businesses in (a) Portsmouth and (b) Hampshire as a whole.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no direct evidence of the impact of increased rates on businesses in either Portsmouth or Hampshire.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has received from the London Docklands Development Corporation concerning major new road construction in its area; and what are the estimated costs of each section of the proposed works.

Sir George Young: I will answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number and size, in terms of bedrooms and type, of residential units sold for under £40,000 on land owned by the London Docklands Development Corporation for each financial year up to march 1986.

Sir George Young: I will answer this question shortly.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much in total has been spent by his Department on parking fines on behalf of vehicles used by Government Departments in each year since 1973.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Untreated Sewage

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the quantity of untreated sewage entering natural water areas in England.

Mr. Rumbold: The responsibility for controlling these discharges rests with the water authorities. The information sought is not held centrally.

Capital Receipts (Local Authorities)

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the accumulated capital receipts held by local authorities at the end of 1984-85.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has now collected information from local authorities on their accumulated capital receipts. At the end of 1984-85 local authorities in England held £6·2 billion of accumulated receipts which, subject to the relevant prescribed proportions, gave rise to spending permission under the capital control system. Of this total, £3·8 billion was backed by cash; the remainder had been used for purposes such as debt repayment.

Nuclear Dumping Sites

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many geologists were employed by NIREX in the research programme which resulted in the selection of the four sites for possible nuclear dumping; and what geological assessment of those sites was subsequently made by his Department.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for NIREX to decide whom it needs to employ. No geological assessment of the sites has been made by my Department since they were announced.

Serpentine Lido

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies are currently being carried out into ways of purifying the bathing water of the Serpentine Lido in Hyde Park; and when these are expected to be completed.

Mrs. Rumbold: Studies are currently being undertaken by water quality experts in the Department of the Environment into the options for disinfecting the water in the Serpentine Lido, Hyde park, in the light of the effect of any new process on the chemical balance of the lake water and the consequences for the fish, water plants and birds. I expect to receive a report with recommendations shortly.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Serpentine Lido in Hyde park to be reopened for use by members of the public.

Mrs. Rumbold: I expect the Serpentine Lido to be reopened for use by members of the public as soon as an acceptable method of disinfecting the water in the Serpentine lake has been identified and works to introduce a new disinfection plant and pumping station, together with any other complementary works, have been carried out. It is impossible to say how long this work will take until a suitable process has been identified and evaluated.

Pollution

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the main causes of pollution in Britain in order of magnitude and estimate, for each factor, the percentage of total environmental pollution for which each is responsible;

(2) which pollutants derive from vehicle exhaust fumes and, in each case, in Britain, what percentage of the total amount of these pollutants in air-borne pollution they presently represent.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information about the emission and discharge of pollutants in the United Kingdom, including that from vehicles, is given in the Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics published annually by my Department. A copy of the latest digest is in the Library of the House.

Fire Resistance Tests

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to accelerate the standardisation of fire resistance tests within the European Economic Community.

Sir George Young: The Commission of the European Communities is preparing proposals for standardisation of fire resistance tests for building materials. As these proposals develop, the Department will be consulting the fire test laboratories and the industry through the appropriate British Stadards Institution committees.

Local Authority Housing (Hampshire)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses have been built by each local authority in Hampshire in each year since 1979.

Sir George Young: Information supplied by local authorities to the Department is in the table:

Dwellings completed by local authorities in Hampshire by calendar year

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people were on the waiting list for council accommodation in each of the local authority areas in Hampshire as of 31 May; and what was the figure on 31 May 1981.

Sir George Young: This information is not held centrally. Local authorities' own criteria for accepting people on to their waiting lists may vary from time to time and thus make comparisons problematic.

Homeless Persons (Hampshire)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homeless persons there were in each of the 13 district council areas in Hampshire as of 31 May.

Sir George Young: Information is not available in the form requested. Local authorities report for each quarter the numbers of households accepted as homeless. The latest figures, for the quarter ended 31 December 1985, are in the table.

Rose Hill Estate, Willenhall

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what conditions have been made by his Department regarding the modernisation of the Rose Hill estate, Willenhall by the Walsall metropolitan borough council; and whether consultations with the tenants are being held by his officials over these conditions;

(2) if he will state the up-to-date position regarding additional funding from his Department to the Walsall metropolitan borough council to modernise the Rose Hill estate in Willenhall; and when it is proposed for the work to be carried out by the local authority.

Sir George Young: The Department's urban housing renewal unit and regional office have discussed with Walsall borough council the prospects for an extra housing investment programme allocation and a community refurbishment scheme on the Rose Hill estate. Revised proposals have only just been received and are currently being considered by the Department. There are no rigid pre-conditions for schemes supported by the urban housing renewal unit, but local authorities are encouraged to introduce improved estate-based housing management and to take full advantage of any opportunities which may exist for obtaining private sector contributions. The local authority will also be expected to have consulted the tenants of the estate about any such proposals.

EMPLOYMENT

Coal and Uranium Mining

Mr. Corbyn asked the Paymaster General if he will set out a list of all studies undertaken by his Department, or bodies sponsored by his Department, on the comparative immediate and latent health risks of coal and uranium mining for fuel stocks for Britain's electricity generation programme.

Mr. Trippier: There are none. A report published by the Health and Safety Executive in 1980 reviews and compares the risks, immediate and latent, in the wider case of coal, oil, and uranium fuel cycles for electricity production.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report the information available to him on the level of unemployment in Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, and the percentage figures at the latest date.

Mr. Lang: The latest available information is given in the table below. The figures are not fully comparable because of national differences in definitions and methods of compilation.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list the 50 travel-to-work areas which have seen the largest rise in unemployment since January 1985; and if he will provide a percentage figure for the rise in unemployment in each case.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. Precise comparisons of unemployment by travel-to-work area between January 1985 and April 1986 are not available because of the change in the timing of compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986; but the table, which shows the 50 travel-to-work areas of Great Britain that between January 1985 and April 1986 have had the largest rise in the published figures of unemployed claimants, expressed both in absolute terms and as a percentage, gives a broad indication of the comparison, which is also affected by seasonal factors.

Health and Safety Executive Laboratories

Mr. Dobson asked the Paymaster General what has been the cost incurred to date in establishing the occupational medicine and hygiene laboratories of the Health and Safety Executive in Edgware Road, London NW2

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Field asked the Paymaster General what responses he has had from his "Lifting the Burden" consultation exercise in respect of deregulating private nursing homes; if he will publish details of the organisations contacted and their responses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: In February, the enterprise and deregulation unit wrote to a wide variety of business organisations, local authority associations and others about 65 licensing requirements imposed by central Government. Views were invited on the extent and nature of the burdens placed on businesses and enforcing authorities by these requirements. Of the 130 responses received, the following included comments on the registration and inspection requirements for residential care and nursing homes under the Registered Homes Act 1984 and the Nursing Homes and Mental Nursing Homes Regulations 1984:

- Association of County Councils
- Association of Metropolitan Authorities
- British Federation of Care Home Proprietors
- Chartered Society of Physiotherapy
- Child Care
- City of London Corporation
- Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine
- Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas
- Enterprise Agency of East Kent
- Independent Hospital Group
- London Boroughs Association
- National Union of Marine Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers
- Registered Nursing Home Association
- Royal College of Pathologists

There was widespread support for stringent controls of residential care and nursing homes and indeed several respondents proposed tighter controls. These responses are being carefully considered by the Department of Health and Social Security in conjunction with the enterprise and deregulation unit. If it appears that changes in the regulations would be desirable, there will be further consultation with the business and other organisations most closely concerned. The Government have, however, no plans to remove controls governing residential care or nursing homes.

Re-establishment Centres

Mr. Soley asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will list the courses and number of places available on Manpower Services Commission courses considered appropriate for the needs of those people currently attending re-establishment centres;

(2) whether the Manpower Services Commission has agreed to take responsibility for the people currently attending the re-establishment centres due to be closed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether the Manpower Services Commission will seek to ensure that employers on Manpower Services Commission schemes accept people currently attending re-establishment centres.

Mr. Lang: The full range of assistance currently provided by the Manpower Services Commission is available to all those attending re-establishment centres; this includes all courses, schemes and services, subject to the normal individual eligibility and suitability criteria. I would strongly encourage each person now attending a re-establishment centre to make contact with his or her local jobcentre as early as possible to discuss their employment needs and the range of services and individual help the Manpower Services Commission has to offer.

Mr. Soley asked the Paymaster General whether his Department intends to accept the transfer of staff currently working in re-establishment centres to the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 22 May at columns 317 and 318.

Miners (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will withdraw his Adjudication Officer's circular debarring unemployment benefit offices from advising redundant mineworkers on unemployment benefit.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 19 May at column 48.

We have no plans to withdraw this circular.

Unemployed Persons (Postal Charges)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if unemployed persons asked to sign on fortnightly by post have to pay postal charges when returning their forms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Most unemployed people attend the unemployment benefit office in person each fortnight to sign on and claim unemployment benefit bearing any travelling costs involved. People living over six miles from their nearest office and some others with special travelling difficulties have the option of claiming by post instead. Since 6 April these "postal claimants" have been asked to pay the postage when returning their fortnightly claim forms. The change was made as a contribution to containing control of public expenditure and a move towards parity of treatment between postal claimants and those bearing regular travelling costs.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total amount to date which has been withheld from (a) all local authorities, (b) local authorities in the Strathclyde region and (c) the Inverclyde district council in the form of penalties imposed by the Government on councils for spending in excess of stipulated amounts.

Mr. Ancram: The information is set out below. General abatement of rate support grant was first used in 1976-77. Prior to 1982-83 abatements were made by withholding a lump sum of rate support grant which would otherwise have been paid to all authorities at the increase order stage. The effect on individual authorities was not specified but all authorities lost grant proportionately. From 1982-83 grant reductions have been related to overspending with reductions in the amounts paid to individual authorities being specified. In addition selective action under section 5 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966 reduced the rate support grant payable to those authorities affected for 1981-82 by £31·3 million.

	Scotland £ million	Local authorities in Strathclyde Region £ million	Inverclyde District Council £ million
1979-80	36·5	—	—
1980-81	50·0	—	—
1981-82	27·0	—	—
1982-83	22·2	13·8	0·0
1983-84	27·6	15·9	0·0
1984-85	62·2	35·9	0·0
1985-86	126·6	78·5	0·0

Notes:

1. Of the £50 million in 1980-81, £15 million affected the rate support grant settlement for 1980-81; £20 million affected the settlement for 1981-82 and £15 million for 1982-83.
2. In 1982-83 and 1983-84 grant abatements were made according to the individual authority's share of rate support grant although arrangements were made to protect authorities spending within guideline at outturn. Since 1984-85 penalties have been directly related to overspending current expenditure guidelines with no penalties for authorities spending within guideline.
3. The figures for the years to 1982-83 are final; those for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are based on near final expenditure; and those for 1985-86 are based on budgets.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total amount of capital receipts which (a) all local authorities, (b) local authorities in the Strathclyde region and (c) the Inverclyde district council are currently prevented from spending because of the current regulations regarding such spending.

Mr. Ancram: None. All Scottish local authorities are entitled to augment their capital spending power, controlled by my right hon. and learned Friend under section 94 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, by the full amount of any capital receipts they raise.

Construction Industry

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of unemployed construction workers in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The most recent information on unemployed construction workers relates to spring 1984 and comes from the labour force survey. From this source the Department of Employment estimates at 33,000 the number of people looking for work in Scotland during the week prior to the survey, whose last job was in the construction industry and who had been unemployed for less than three years. Sample sizes are too small to provide reliable estimates for Strathclyde or Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Regional Development Grants

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the total of regional development grants has been paid to firms in (a) Inverclyde district and (b) the Strathclyde region in each year since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information in the form requested is not available. However, payments of old regional development grant for groupings of Department of Employment Local Office Areas (EOAs) corresponding broadly to Inverclyde district and Strathclyde region are given below. Comparable information for payments of new regional development grant is not available.

	Inverclyde area £ million	Strathclyde area £ million
1980	1·6	29·2
1981	5·7	53·7
1982	6·0	65·6
1983	2·9	37·1
1984	5·6	38·5
1985	9·9	45·7

Notes:
(1) Includes payments of over £25,000 only;
(2) Iverclyde area comprises Greenock and Port Glasgow EOAs;
(3) Strathclyde area comprises EOAs in the following old travel-to-work areas: Ayr, Campbeltown, Cumnock, Dumbarton, Dunoon, Girvan, Glasgow, Greenock, Irvine, Kilmarnock, Lanark, Lochgilphead, North Lanarkshire, Oban, Paisley and Rothesay.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of firms in (a) the Inverclyde district and (b) Strathclyde region which have received regional development grant payments since 1979 and have subsequently closed down or announced redundancies; and if he will give an estimate of the numbers of jobs involved.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been paid out in regional development grants in Scotland since the changes announced in November 1984; and what is the proportion paid out to Fife.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In the period up to end-April 1986, £12·1 million new regional development grant was paid to businesses in Scotland, and no new regional development grant had been paid out to businesses in Fife. Comparable figures for payments of old regional development grants are not available.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many people were registered as unemployed in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each year since 1979;

(2) how many vacancies were available in jobcentres in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow in May 1979, June 1983 and at the latest date for which figures are available;

(3) what specific plans he has to reduce youth unemployment in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Greenock and Port Glasgow;

(4) what was the level of youth unemployment in the Greenock travel-to-work area at the latest date for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and subsequent years;

(5) what was the level of long-term unemployment in Greenock and Port Glasgow at the latest date for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and subsequent years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the rate of redundancies per thousand employees in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In 1985 redundancies per thousand employees in Scotland, Strathclyde and the Greenock and Port Glasgow area were respectively 13·5, 14·5 and 47·2. The employment base used for Scotland relates to 1985, and for Strathclyde and Greenock and Port Glasgow to 1981.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the financial investment by the Scottish Development Agency from 1979 to 1985 in the following areas: (a) Dundee, (b) Inverclyde, (c) Motherwell, (d) East Kilbride, (e) Glengarnock, (f) Kilmarnock, (g) Fife and (h) Cumnock and Doon Valley;

(2) what were the annual budgets of the Scottish Development Agency for the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive; and if he will list as a percentage of those budgets, investment in the following areas; (a) Dundee, (b) Inverclyde, (c) Motherwell, (d) East Kilbride, (e) Glengarnock, (f) Kilmarnock, (g) Fife and (h) Cumnock and Doon Valley.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been spent by the Scottish Development Agency in (a) Fife and (b) Dunfermline district in each year since it was established; and if he will show these figures as a proportion of total expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Electricity Boards

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he last met the chairman of the North of Scotland Hydro Electricity Board; and what subjects were discussed;

(2) when he last met the chairman of the South of Scotland Electricity Board; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. and learned Friend met the chairmen of the two Scottish electricity boards on 17 March when a range of issues of current interest, including nuclar matters, was discussed.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements exist between the two Scottish electricity boards for determining generation policy; what procedure is used by the boards to consult the Central Electricity Generating Board; and if he will make a statement on co-ordination in relation to these matters between the Scottish Office and the Department of Energy.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Scottish electricity boards collaborate closely on the planning of the electricity generating system in Scotland which they operate jointly and the chairman of each board is a member of the other board. The Scottish boards and the Central Electricity Generating Board have regular discussions about matters of common interest through, for example, a planning liaison committee on which the three boards are represented. Responsibility for these arrangements rests with the boards.

My officials and those of the Department of Energy are in regular contact with each other and with the electricity supply industry about these matters.

North of Scotland Hydro Electric Board

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the members of the North of Scotland Hydro Electric Board; the dates of their original appointment and the dates when their present appointments terminate.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

	Date of original appointment	Date of expiry of current appointment
Mr. M. Joughin (Chairman)	1 January 1983	31 December 1990
Mr. K. R. Vernon (Deputy Chairman)	1 January 1970	15 March 1988
Mr. G. Barrie	1 March 1985	31 December 1987
Mrs. C. A. M. Davis	1 January 1980	31 December 1988
Mr. C. S. Macphie	10 February 1984	31 December 1986
Mr. D. J. Miller*	1 April 1982	31 March 1987
Mr. D. F. Myles	1 March 1985	31 December 1987
Mr. A. T. H. Tulloch	10 February 1984	31 December 1986
Mr. M. G. N. Walker	1 January 1982	31 December 1987

* Ex-officio member, as Chairman of the South of Scotland Electricity Board.

Peterhead-Aberdeen Road

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to improve the Peterhead-Aberdeen trunk road at the Hatton village section in view of the potentially dangerous bends; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Improvements are being planned for the section of the A952 immediately to the north-east of Hatton village, including the elimination of the bends. Draft road orders are expected to be published later this year with a view to starting work in about two to three years' time, assuming the satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures and the availability of finance within the trunk road programme.

Domestic Water Supplies

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will supply in the Official Report details of the campaigns in (a) Scotland and (b) Glasgow to eradicate lead domestic water pipes; what was the cost of the work to change these pipes; and how many households were affected;

(2) how many households in (a) Scotland and (b) Glasgow have had their domestic water supply pipes changed from lead to copper.

Mr. Ancram: Advice on lead in water was sent by the Scottish Health Education Group to every household in Scotland during the period November 1982 to February 1983.

In the period 1982-85 some 63,000 households in Scotland, of which 17,379 were in Glasgow, have had lead domestic water supply pipes replaced at an estimated cost of £25 million. No information is held centrally of the material used to replace lead pipes.

Mr. McTaggart: asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the results of the £25 million spent for replacing lead pipes in domestic water supplies in Scotland and the effect of the changes on lead content in water.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated expenditure of about £25 million over the period 1982 to 1985 has resulted in lead plumbing being replaced in about 63,000 houses in the public and private sectors in Scotland. It is expected that, as a result, the level of lead in drinking water in the houses concerned will be reduced to a level not exceeding the current stand of 0·1 mg/l laid down in the EC directive on the quality of water for human consumption.

Asbestos

Mr. Wilson: asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all local authorities which have replied to the request in Scottish Development Department circular 26/1983 to notify the Department of action taken to identify asbestos used in housing stock; and what remedial action has been taken by local authorities.

Mr. Ancram: Cumnock and Doon, Cumbernauld and Kilsyth, and Nithsdale district councils have so far informed the Department that they have taken action to identify asbestos products in their housing stock. Authorities were not asked to report to the Department the nature of any remdial action they conclude, in consequence, is required to deal with asbestos.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been paid out in regional selective assistance in (a) Fife and (b) Scotland since the changes announced in November 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In the period 29 November 1984 to end-April 1986, payments of regional selective assistance in Fife and Scotland amounted to £6·1 million and £64·2 million respectively.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will conduct an inquiry into the charges and standards of private hospitals in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to issue new regulations on medical procedures and standards to be adopted by private hospitals in Scotland;

(3) if he will introduce legislation to give health boards the power to inspect the charges and standards of private hospitals and to oblige them to issue a yearly report on the operation of such hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: Health boards are at present empowered to maintain a register of private nursing homes and hospitals and to inspect such establishments at regular intervals to ensure that standards are properly maintained. Boards have the power to cancel registration if the appropriate requirements are not being met. There is no evidence to suggest that boards to not undertake their functions efficiently and effectively. It is proposed, however, to strengthen boards' powers by new regulations to extend the control they may exercise over the conduct of private nursing homes and hospitals, the facilities and services and the production of records. It is not intended to require boards to make a yearly report on the exercise of their powers. The new regulations will be issued shortly in draft form for consultation purposes to health boards and other interested organisations.

Charges levied by private nursing homes and hospitals are solely a matter for the management of such establishments and there are no plans to conduct an inquiry as proposed, or to take powers to regulate these charges.

Business Closures

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many business closures have been notified to his Department since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: From the beginning of 1980 to the end of March 1986, 1,509 closures affecting 10 or more workers were notified to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in Scotland.

Police Surgeons

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of male and female police surgeons, respectively, presently attached to each police authority in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: I understand that the numbers of police surgeons presently employed or retained by each police authority are as follows:

Force	Male	Female	Total
Central	6	—	6
Dumfries and Galloway	1	—	1
Fife	6	—	6
Grampian	4	—	4
Lothian and Borders	11	—	11
Northern*	15	1	16
Strathclyde†	107	3	110
Tayside	32	4	36

* Other doctors are available on a payment per call-out basis.
† The figures for Strathclyde, including the breakdown by sex, are approximate.

I am aware that, in the light of the guidance contained in the circular on the investigation of complaints of sexual assault which my Department issued to chief constables in November 1985, authorities are making efforts to recruit more female police surgeons.

Leith Docks (Radioactive Materials)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what radioactive materials were exported or imported through Leith docks during the past 12 months.

Mr. Moore: I have been asked to reply.

I am informed that no such materials were handled at Leith docks during the last 12 months.

Leukaemia

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the validation of the cases of leukaemia in 0-24 year olds occurring in Scotland between 1968 and 1981 is now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 15 April 1986, c. 322-4]: Results are now available of a preliminary study by the Information Services Division of the Common Services Agency into the incidence of leukaemia in Scotland in the 0-24 year age group. This study has been prepared for the public local Inquiry at Dounreay, and is to be made available by the reporter to all the parties to the inquiry. I have arranged for copies to be placed today in the Library of the House.

The report suggests that leukaemia in 0-24 year olds shows no tendency to cluster, other than by chance. However, it identifies three postcode sectors where the incidence of leukaemia is considerably higher than expected—West Thurso, West Central Edinburgh, and South-West Perth and Dunning. It acknowledges that in all three sectors this could have been a chance occurrence. However, because of the existence of a prior hypothesis which links the incidence of leukaemia with proximity to nuclear establishments, and the occurrence of five cases in the west Thurso postcode sector, which includes Dounreay, between 1979 and 1983, the report recommends that case control studies of areas near nuclear power stations be undertaken. I would stress that the two other areas identified in one of the three time bands studied have no links with nuclear establishments. This is furthermore a preliminary study. A fuller report is being prepared. It will be published and made available to the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment, which will be asked to advise on the case for and form of further studies.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria Her Majesty's Government have laid down for diplomatic recognition of the People's Democratic Republic of Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: We recognise the state of Afghanistan. We do not have normal Government-to-Government dealings with the current regime.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Eggar: This Department has submitted eight applications for registration under the Data Protection Act.

One officer is presently employed full time as a data protection co-ordinator, and each department and mission in the Diplomatic Service has a liaison officer appointed to ensure that the eight principles are followed.

New expenditure involved will be approximately £36,500 annually. The total annual cost including the time of existing staff is estimated at £146,000.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many certificates he has signed under section 27 of the Data Protection Act; and if he will describe briefly the subject matter of each.

Mr. Eggar: Certificates under section 27 of the Data Protection Act relate to exemption from the provisions of part II and sections 21 to 24 of part IV of the Act, for the purpose of safeguarding national security. Disclosing details of such certificates would itself not be in the interests of national security.

Horn of Africa

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the European Council of Foreign Ministers has discussed the Italian mediation in the Horn of Africa.

Mr. Eggar: Developments in the Horn of Africa are the subject of regular exchanges among the Twelve at official level. The possibility of Italian mediation in the Horn of Africa has not been discussed by the European Council of Ministers.

South Africa

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 3 June, what objectives of Her Majesty's Government's diplomatic policy towards South Africa are served by the continued presence in the United Kingdom of military attaches from South Africa; and what is their current diplomatic status.

Mr. Eggar: As I told the hon. Member on 5 June, the continued presence of the South African military attachés in Britain remains under review. They are members of the diplomatic staff at the South African embassy and are like all foreign diplomats, who are appointed by their Governments for their own representational purposes.

Mr. Stanley Adams

Mr. Cabom asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to whether the European Commission have yet made a final settlement with Mr. Stanley Adams in line with the European Court of Justice judgment in Luxembourg on 7 November 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: In its judgment, the court gave the parties nine months in which to reach agreement on a settlement themselves. We understand that Mr. Adams' solicitors have recently supplied details to the Commission to support his claim and that the Commission is now studying them.

Malta

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what property is owned by Her Majesty's Government in Malta.

Mr. Eggar: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office owns one house in Malta, the residence of the Deputy High Commissioner. All other Foreign and Commonwealth Office properties in Malta are rented.

TRANSPORT

A38 (Safety Barriers)

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has plans to erect safety barriers on the A38 between Clay Mills and the Branston turn off.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The existing safety fence on the northbound carriageway of the A38 adjacent to Hurst drive, Stretton, will be extended 100 m northwards. We are reviewing the position elsewhere on the Burton bypass and I will write to my hon. Friend when this is complete.

A6 (Bypass)

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to bring forward plans for the by-passing of the villages of Clapham and Milton Ernest on the A6 in Bedfordshire; and what is the approximate cost of both schemes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A bypass for Clapham was added to the roads programme in 1985 for construction in the period for 1989 onwards. The next step will be to appoint consulting engineers for the scheme following a fee competition announced on 4 June. The scheme is expected to cost about £4·5 million at November 1983 prices. There are no plans for a bypass of Milton Ernest.

Marsh Mills Viaduct, Plymouth

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost of repairing the Marsh Mills viaduct at Plymouth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: About £500,000 has been spent, largely in the last two years, on repairing the viaducts and on associated works.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of the construction of the Marsh Mills viaduct at Plymouth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The construction cost, in 1969-71, was about £1 million.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the Marsh Mills viaduct at Plymouth was built; what is its estimated length of life; whom his Department has commissioned to design the new viaduct; at what cost; and when it is proposed a new viaduct should be constructed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The viaducts were opened in 1971. Alkali-aggregate reaction in the concrete has affected the remaining reliable service life which is now expected to be at least five years, perhaps much more. The condition of the structures is being regularly monitored.

The Department has recently commissioned Mott Hay and Anderson, consulting engineers, to design a new viaduct. It is too early yet to give an estimate of its likely cost or the construction timetable.

Dangerous Substances

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in drafting the proposed new Dangerous Substances (Carriage by Road in Packages Etc.) Regulations; and when he intends to lay them before the House.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Commission expects to consider the draft regulations within the next two months. Subject to their acceptance, the proposals will be submitted to my right hon. Friend shortly afterwards. We hope to be able to lay them after the summer recess.

A47 Wardley Hill Improvement, Rutland

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is now able to give a specific date for the start of the A47 Wardley Hill improvement scheme in the Rutland district of Leicestershire.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Construction on the A47 Wardley Hill improvement should start in the late autumn, a little ahead of our previous schedule.

Heathrow-Gatwick Helicopter Link

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to issue a direction to the Civil Aviation Authority in respect of the Heathrow to Gatwick helicopter link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: My right hon. Friend, the then Secretary of State for Transport, announced on 6 May that he was minded to give a direction to the Civil Aviation Authority so that the helicopter service formerly operated between Heathrow and Gatwick airports by British Caledonian Airways Limited would not be allowed to recommence. Before doing so, however, he would consult the authority as required under section 6(2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, and his officials were writing to British Caledonian.

The Civil Aviation Authority had no points to make on the proposal that it be given such a direction. British Caledonian expressed its disappointment, and I have taken careful note of the comments made in its reply. I have also taken note of the other representations that have been received: some in support of the proposed direction and others opposed to it.

Having considered these comments and representations, however, I am of the view that the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter service cannot be justified when the alternative forms of transport between Heathrow and Gatwick airports are taken into account. I have, therefore, today directed the Civil Aviation Authority not to grant approval for British Caledonian to resume scheduled helicopter flights between Heathrow and Gatwick airports.

Air Traffic Forecasts

Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has yet completed updated forecasts of air traffic; and when they will be available.

Mr. Moore: I am publishing today my Department's latest air traffic forecasts and have placed a copy of them in the Library of the House.

Public Transport, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will deposit in the Library a copy of his Department's publication entitled "Investment in Public Transport in London"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I know of no such departmental publication.

British Rail Engineering

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to the statement made by his predecessor on British Rail Engineering on 20 May, Official Report, column 188, if he will list in the Official Report the number and type of new traction and rolling stock which have entered British Rail's service in the past six years.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that the following vehicles have entered service during the past six years:

Type	Number of vehicles
Locomotives
Class 56	79
Class 58	41
Class 59	4

Falmouth Container Terminal

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer of 22 May, Official Report, column 247, regarding the desk study on the Falmouth container terminal, he will identify the navigational interests and other bodies with whom consultations are taking place and the source of the independent professional advice being sought by his Department.

Mr. Moore: The following bodies with navigational interests have been consulted by my Department:

Falmouth Harbour Commissioners
Falmouth Docks and Engineering Company
Carrick district council (as harbour authority for Penryn and Truro)
St. Mawes Pier and Harbour Company
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
HM Coastguard, Falmouth

I understand that Falmouth Container Terminal Ltd. sent copies of the desk study to the Duchy of Cornwall and the Nature Conservancy Trust, and we have invited their comments on navigation. The Department also informed Cornwall county council that the desk study had been received.

The Department has received independent professional advice from the Hydrographic Department of the Ministry of Defence.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents involving heavy goods vehicles have been investigated by his Department inspectors; and if he will publish the detailed conclusions in a similar manner to those published following railway accidents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the period April 1985 to March 1986 the Department's vehicle inspectorate investigated 1,095 accidents involving heavy goods vehicles. The more serious or significant of these (some 30 per cent.) were subjected to detailed analysis. I have no plans to publish detailed conclusions to these investigations.

Railway Stations (Disabled People)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 327, if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the extent to which London boroughs are exploring with British Rail various possibilities for improving disabled passenger facilities at stations in their areas, under section 59 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. This is a matter between the boroughs and the British Railways Board. As I said in my previous reply to the hon. Gentleman, I welcome the fact that British Rail are exploring possibilities with the London boroughs for improving facilities for disabled passengers.

Data Protection Act (Registration)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Moore: My Department has made eight registrations under the Data Protection Act 1984. One person has the implementation of the legislation as a significant part of his job description. It is too soon to estimate the cost of conforming with the eight data

Bedford Bypass

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the proposals to lay before the public the route he proposes for bypassing Bedford ; and whether the scheme will make provision for both the A428 and the A6.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: All the options about which the public were consulted in July 1985 provided for relief for both the A428 and the A6. The preferred route will be announced as soon as we have completed our consideration of the responses received.

London Airports (Traffic Distribution)

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received the final advice of the Civil Aviation Authority on the case for changes to the present rules for traffic distribution between the London airports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Yes. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement in due course.

Nuclear Fuel and Waste Transportation

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he can give details of all incidents and accidents involving the transportation of nuclear waste and spent fuel since 1983.

Mr. Moore: No such incidents or accidents in the United Kingdom in which there was any leakage of radioactive material have been reported to me.

A40 (Improvements)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will issue the draft orders on improvements to the A40 at Western Circus and Gypsy Corner.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Draft orders for the Western Circus junction improvement were published in November 1985 and January 1986. We hope to publish draft orders for the Gypsy Corner junction improvement later this year.

A406 (Improvements)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary for Transport (1) when he received the inspector's report on the proposed improvement to the A406, west of Chingford road to Hale End road; and when he will publish his decision;

(2) when he received the inspector's report on the proposed improvements to the A406, Popes lane to Western avenue; and when he will publish his decision;

(3) when he received the inspector's report on the proposed improvement to the A406, Hanger lane to Harrow road; and when he will publish his decision.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The decisions on these schemes will be taken jointly by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment. The inspector's report for Chingford road to Hale End road was received at the end of February this year: it is hoped to announce the decision during the summer.

The report for Hanger lane to Harrow road was received in spring last year and the decision should be announced very shortly. The report for Popes lane to Western avenue was received last summer. It raised issues which are taking some time to resolve. I cannot yet forecast when the decision will be announced.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Grants)

Mr. Arnold asked the Prime Minister what steps she takes to monitor the extent to which each Government Department takes up the European Community grants available to it; and what percentage of such grants were taken up in the last year.

The Prime Minister: The Government keep the level of United Kingdom receipts from the Community budget under close scrutiny. In 1985 the United Kingdom received a total of £1,853 million from Community funds. The table below shows the percentage share of United Kingdom receipts from the main funds:

	per cent.
Agricultural Guarantee	9·4
Agricultural Guidance	3·2
European Social Fund (ESF)	30·8
European Development Fund (ERDF)	28·9

There is no fixed entitlement for United Kingdom receipts from Community funds with the exception of the ERDF which in 1985 had commitment quota ranges of 21·42-28·56 per cent. Twenty-six per cent. was allocated to the United Kingdom from the ERDF in 1985.

Radiation

Mr. Speller asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of 8 May, Official Report, column 216, what advisory literature is already available detailing precautions specifically designed for the person and the home in case of radioactive fallout over the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: Two booklets are currently available: "Domestic Nuclear Shelters" and "Domestic Nuclear Shelters—Technical Guidance".

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister how many certificates she has signed under section 27 of the Data Protection Act; and if she will describe briefly the subject matter of each.

The Prime Minister: Certificates under section 27 of the Data Protection Act relate to exemption from the provisions of part II and sections 21 to 24 of part IV of the Act, for the purpose of safeguarding national security. Disclosing details of such certificates would itself not be in the interests of national security.

Nuclear Power Stations

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Prime Minister whether she will make it her policy to seek an international accord for minimum safety standards at all nuclear power stations, leading to the eventual creation of an international inspectorate.

The Prime Minister: The statement made at the Tokyo summit meeting emphasised that each country engaged in nuclear power generation bears full responsibility for the safety of its installations. In recent discussions in the international Atomic Energy Agency there has already been agreement on the need to consider means of improving co-operation in the field of nuclear safety; the ideas mentioned by my hon. Friend are among those which will be considered.

Dog Licences

Mr. Dover asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the co-ordination of Her Majesty's Government's policy towards dog licences between the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland and the Environment.

The Prime Minister: The dog licensing arrangements in Northern Ireland are a factor which the Government are taking into account in considering future arrangements in Great Britain. The nature of dog nuisance in Northern Ireland is more serious than in other parts of the United Kingdom and measures taken in the former are not necessarily appropriate to the latter.

Quangos

Mr. Kaufman asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 23 May to the honourable Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) on quangos, Official Report, column 351, if she will state, out of the 756 quangos which she listed as having been abolished, rationalised or substantially reduced, how many of those which had been reduced are still in existence; what form the rationalisation took in the relevant cases; of those which were rationalised how many are still in existence; how many of the 756 were completely abolished; and how many of the 756 still exist.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to the right hon. Gentleman shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Shipbuilders

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people were employed by British Shipbuilders in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow and (b) Strathclyde for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

South African Gold Coins

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his reply of 23 May, Official Report, column 364, how he intends to implement the prohibition of the importation of South African gold coins; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The prohibition on the importation of South African gold coins announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 23 May in column 327 has been implemented by amendment to the open general import licence granted under the Import of Goods (Control) Order 1954.

Spain and Portugal (Car Manufacturing)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to extend to Spain and Portugal the voluntary agreement on cars reached with Japan.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On their accession to the Community, Spain and Portugal sought and obtained the Community's authority to continue their quantitative restrictions on the import of Japanese vehicles which had existed prior to accession.

Limited Companies (Interest-free Loans)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the interest-free loans made by nationalised industries within his departmental responsibility to limited companies which were outstanding on (a) 31 March 1985, (b) 31 March 1986 and (c) 31 May 1986.

Mr. Butcher: This is a matter for the board of the nationalised industries concerned.

Private Consumer Contracts

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he takes steps to monitor compliance by insurers with the terms of their codes of conduct for private consumer contracts.

Mr. Howard: Monitoring of compliance with the terms of the statements of insurance practice is in the first instance a matter for the Association of British Insurers and Lloyd's. My Department does, however, take careful note of any complaints either received direct from members of the public or reported from other sources.

Private Hospitals (Fees and Charges)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make an order under section 5 of the Prices Act 1974 compelling private hospitals to display their fees and their charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The relevant powers are in section 4 of the Act, as amended, but I have no plans to make an order for this purpose. I am not satisfied that such a measure would be justified, nor, in view of the wide range of services and treatments provided, that it would be practicable.

Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) Scheme

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide a detailed breakdown of the £80 million loss incurred under the Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it is established practice that the Export Credits Guarantee Department does not make public details of particular transactions it supports. However, losses under the Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) scheme are not of the order of magnitude stated.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the details of the agreement reached in or after 1983 between the Export Credits Guarantee Department and the London and Scottish clearing banks on money paid to the banks under the Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) Scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: There has been no general agreement reached between ECGD and the London and Scottish clearing banks on the Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) in the period quoted.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has given to banks operating the Comprehensive Bank Guarantee (Open Account) scheme, on which accounts money to be received by the exporters is to be paid into.

Mr. Alan Clark: None. This is a matter between the exporter and his bank.

Export Credits

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer of 6 May, Official Report, column 25, if he has now received a letter from the European Economic Community Commission's directorate for competition about allegations that the Export Credits Guarantee Department breach of the European Economic Community rules about export credit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have not reveived a letter on this particular topic. Since my reply of 6 May the Commission has written to all EC member states to inquire about their current practice in relation to the possibility of interest rate subsidies in support of exports to the EC via other countries. The information requested will be provided.

Electric Lawnmowers

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what information he has on the number of people injured or killed each year while using domestic electric lawnmowers;

(2) if he will introduce legislation requiring manufacturers to fit all new electric lawnmowers with safety circuit breakers.

Mr. Howard: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Safety of Goods

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he proposes to introduce legislation to implement a general duty to sell safe goods, as proposed in his White Paper on the safety of goods.

Mr. Howard: Yes. We propose to introduce a general safety duty as soon as the legislative programme permits.

Auditors (Financial Services Sector)

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the role of auditors in the financial services sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The work of the supervisory authorities in the financial services sector will be aided if they can develop a relationship with the auditors of authorised businesses. Such a contribution should not involve auditors fulfilling a supervisory role on the regulator's behalf and should not undermine the close relationship which should exist between an auditor and his client. I intend to bring forward amendments to the Financial Services Bill which will seek no facilitate communications between auditor and supervisor, and contribute to the development of an effective relationship between them.

The amendments will enable regulations to be made requiring all authorised persons to appoint an "auditor", whose duties and rights of access to paper and other documents will be defined in the regulations.

The Bill already enables rules to be made requiring accounts and other information submitted to a supervisor by an investment business to be reported on by the auditor of that business. An amendment will be brought forward to enable the supervisor to require a further report to be made by a separate independent accountant, if he is dissatisfied with the initial report.

I have given especially careful consideration to the definition of those circumstances in which an auditor should be expected to report on his own initiative to a supervisor.

In the light of this consideration and of the many representations which I have received from the profession, I have concluded that there should be no general duty placed on auditors in the Bill to report to supervisors. The particular circumstances in which a report should be made need to be carefully defined. I believe that this is best achieved by professional guidance and I look to the professional accountancy bodies, in consultation with the supervisors, to draw up such guidance. But an amendment to the Bill will be brought forward to give the Secretary of State a reserve power to lay down rules obliging auditors to report in certain circumstances to the supervisors. Such a power would be invoked only if suitable professional guidance was not issued. I would not propose that this power would be transferable to a designated agency.

A further amendment will be proposed to provide that no duty which an auditor owes to a company or firm should prevent him from giving information to a supervisor. The auditor will accordingly not be liable for loss suffered as a result of such a report if made in good faith. Nor will he be liable for defamation as such reports would automatically attract qualified privilege.

It will also be proposed that a supervisor should be able to disclose information about a client to its auditor if such disclosure would enable or assist the supervisor to carry out his duties.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is considering the introduction of parallel measures for banks, as described in the White Paper on banking supervision, Cmnd. 9695, and for building societies.

Financial Services Bill

Mr. Nelson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received representations concerning the provisions of the Financial Services Bill relating to recognised professional bodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have received a number of representations from interested parties on this subject.

As a result I have concluded that the Bill should be amended so as to confer authorisation to carry on investment business on corporate practices, partnerships or members of recognised professional bodies practising the profession on their own account. A business will be authorised for the purposes of the Bill if it holds an appropriate certificate issued by the body concerned. This provision will replace that now included in the Bill which confers automatic authorisation on individual members of recognised bodies.

It is the intention that recognised professional bodies should only supervise investment business which is incidental to the practice of the profession concerned. It will be a condition of recognition that a body satisfies the Secretary of State or designated agency that it has arrangements for ensuring that certificates are issued only to businesses whose main business is the practice of the relevant profession. Recognised professional bodies will also be required to have rules limiting the kinds of investment business which may be carried on and the circumstances in which such business is to be regarded as carried on in the course of practising the profession. This requirement will be in addition to the existing requirement in the Bill to have and enforce rules which provide a level of investor protection at least equivalent to that provided by rules under chapter V of part I of the Bill.

I have also decided that in the light of the limited kind and scale of investment business which will be regulated by recognised professional bodies it will not be necessary to give the Secretary of State or designated agency a power to change their rules, as I am proposing in the case of recognised self-regulating organisations. The Secretary of State or designated agency will, however, be able to apply to the courts for a compliance order if any of the recognition requirements are not complied with, as is currently provided for in the case of recognised self-regulating organisations by clause 12 of the Bill.

On the same grounds I have decided that it would not be appropriate to extend to recognised professional bodies the same immunity from suit for damages as I shall be proposing for recognised self-regulating organisations.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people were employed by the British Steel Corporation in the northern region for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1986, c. 409]: Defining the northern region as Northumberland, Tyne and Wear, Cleveland, Durham, and Cumbria, the following table gives the number employed there by BSC at end-September in each of the years since 1979:

	Number
1979	35,800
1980	28,950
1981	20,450
1982	15,250
1983	11,910
1985	9,920

These figures have been supplied by BSC. The reduction in numbers is due to the need for the industry to reach the productivity levels necessary to remain competitive. A number of jobs have also been returned to the private sector as BSC has decided that certain companies, in particular Redpath Dorman Long, can resume operations in the private sector.

Regional Aid

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the total of regional development grants has been paid to firms in the northern region in each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1986, c. 409]: The information requested is

Year	Percentage
1980	24
1981	25
1982	22
1983	18

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been spent in regional aid in the northern region since 1983; and how many jobs are estimated to have been (a) created or (b) preserved.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to this reply, 3 June 1986, c. 406]: Between April 1983 and March 1986, £303·9 million in regional aid—regional selective assistance and old-and new-style regional development grants — was paid to companies in the northern region. An estimated 28,100 jobs were expected to be created and 10,300 jobs preserved as a result of payments of new-style RDGs and offers of RSA made in this period. Since old-style RDGs are not linked to the creation or preservation of jobs no estimate is available of the effect on employment of payments under that scheme.

Printing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the production and employment trends in the United Kingdom printing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1986, c. 406]: The production and employment figures for the printing and publishing industries — group 475 of the Standard Industrial Classification, 1980—are as follows:

	Index of production (1980 = 100)	Great Britain employment ('000s)
1981	95·4	349
1982	92·7	344
1983	92·2	340
1984	97·5	340
1985	*101·5	*347

* provisional.

I am pleased to note that the industry is sharing in the recovery in output shown by United Kingdom industry in recent years.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Rain Forests

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to influence international aid and trade organisations to promote the sustainable development and protection of tropical rain forests.

Mr. Raison: We have made it clear to all concerned that we support the wise use and regeneration of tropical forests, and have accepted the Food and Agriculture Organisation's tropical forestry action plan as a framework of our actions. We welcome requests from aid recipient countries for help in the forestry sector, and try to meet them in both our bilateral programmes and the work of the multilateral institutions of which we are part.

Indonesia

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will review United Kingdom financial and other support for Indonesia's transmigration programme in the light of its effect on the rain forests of Indonesia's outer isles and the indigenous people living there;

(2) how much has been contributed by Her Majesty's Government (a) directly or (b) through international institutions, to Indonesia's transmigration programme to date;

(3) what assessment his Department made of the environmental and cultural impact of Indonesia's transmigration programme on the rain forests of Indonesia's outer isles and the indigenous people living there.

Mr. Raison: The Government do not give direct financial or other support through bilateral or multilateral channels to the Indonesian transmigration programme. The land resources development centre of the Overseas Development Administration has been retained by the World Bank to advise on the selection of sites and use of land within the programme, and has thus been able to help minimise adverse effects on the environment and the indigenous population. My Department has not made an independent assessment of the impact of the programme, but information about it is widely available from other sources.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the question of the impact of Indonesia's transmigration programme on the rain forests of Indonesia's outer isles and the indigenous people living there at the next meeting of the intergovernmental group on Indonesia in The Hague on 18 and 19 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The intergovernmental group on Indonesia reviews Indonesia's economic prospects and external financial needs. Its meetings are not the right place for detailed discussion of particular projects.

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what environmental and cultural policy guidelines govern project lending by the World Bank and the intergovernmental group on Indonesia.

Mr. Raison: The World Bank has published a number of documents on its approach to environmental matters. I shall sent the right hon. Member a copy of "Environmental Policies and Procedures of the World Bank" which summarises the principles behind bank guidelines and other related material.

Forestry

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide an updated list of projects to encourage sustainable forestry in those countries which are aided by the Commonwealth Development Corporation and the Overseas Development Administration; and if he will give details of the financial sums involved.

Mr. Raison: The list is as follows:

Developing Countries

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British consultants are employed by his Department to assist in work in the developing countries.

Mr. Raison: The information requested is not readily available. In 1985 the ODA engaged British consultancy firms to undertake 155 new contracts in order to provide services financed from technical co-operation funds and the aid and trade provision. This excludes certain small contracts (less than £30,000) and contracts provided under capital aid.

Aid Programme

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the instances since 1979 in the overseas aid programme of cancellation of contribution on grounds of abuse of human rights in the country concerned.

Mr. Raison: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 18 March 1986 at column 121.

South Africa

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what offers of assistance have been made by Her Majesty's ambassador in South Africa to those who have been made homeless from the squatter's camp in Cape Town, South Africa.

Mr. Raison: £10,000 has been given to the South African Red Cross for the purchase of 5,000 blankets for the homeless in the Crossroads township.

Afghanistan

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all organisations receiving financial assistance from Her Majesty's Government for each year since 1979 in connection with activities concerning Afghanistan; and what were the amounts involved.

In addition, the British share of European Community food aid for Afghan refugees has amounted to some £10 million and of European Community relief aid to some £5·5 million.

ENERGY

Nuclear Materials

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the impact of the Chernobyl nuclear accident on the international convention on the security of nuclear materials.

Mr. Goodlad: Her Majesty's Government continue to favour the early entry into force of the convention on the physical security of nuclear materials.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, further to his answer of 3 June, Official Report, column 467, he will give further details of discussions between his Department and the Central Electricity Generating Board in 1986 on (a) plutonium and b) the safeguarding of nuclear material generated in the Central Electricity Generating Board's nuclear reactors, against diversion to military use; which of his Department's officials were involved; and on which dates.

Mr. Goodlad: I have nothing to add to my answer of 3 June 1986 at column 467.

Nuclear Power Stations (Electricity Generation)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Engery if he will list for each of Calder Hall, Chapelcross, Berkeley, Bradwell, Dungeness 'A', Hinkley Point 'A', Hunterston 'A', Oldbury-on-Severn, Sizewell 'A' and Trawsfynydd the electricity generated during a recent convenient year, and the percentage of the total electricity board's output this represents.

Mr. Goodlad: The information for 1984-85 is as follows:

Station	Electricity generated (Gwh)
Calder Hall	1,703·5
Chapelcross	1,723·1
Berkeley	936·7
Bradwell	1,996·4
Dungeness 'A'	3,065·3
Hinckley 'A'	4,108·7
Hunterston 'A'	2,535·9
Oldbury-on-Severn	3,296·9
Sizewell	2,539·9
Trawsfynydd	3,460·3
Total	25,366·7

Source: Electricity Supply Handbook 1986.

Calder Hall and Chapelcross, which are operated by British Nuclear Fuels, provided electricity to the public supply system equivalent to 1·3 per cent. of the electricity boards' generation in 1984-85. The CEGB and the Scottish electricity boards advise that the remaining stations represented 8·3 per cent. of their generation in 1984-85.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Peter Walker: As I informed the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 22 May, at column 253, my Department has submitted six applications for registration under the Act. Implementing the Act is a significant part of the job of only one of my officials. Conforming with the first six of the data protection principles and the eighth will not involve extra costs since these embrace existing good computing practice. In advance of any experience of the number of inquiries made in a given period by individuals about personal information which may be held on my Department's computers, it is not possible to give an estimate of the costs likely to be incurred in complying with the seventh principle.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 3 June, if he will explain how an official car meeting a Minister at Heathrow airport returning from an official engagement in 1985 incurred a parking ticket.

Mr. Peter Walker: Unfortunately, for reasons of security, it is not always possible for ministerial cars to wait only in approved parking areas if these are some distance from an arrival point. On this occasion the car, with its driver in attendance, was waiting briefly on a double yellow line.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 3 June, what was the nature of the official gift purchased in Knightsbridge in 1985 which led to a parking ticket being issued; where was the gift purchased; who purchased it; how much it cost; which Minister presented it; and to whom.

Mr. Peter Walker: No gift was purchased in Knightsbridge, since an appropriate item could not be found at an acceptable price. The gift being looked for was for presentation by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State to the operators of the Argyll field to commemorate the tenth anniversary of North sea oil production.

Magnox Reactors

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to ensure that all documents relating to the 20-year safety reviews of Magnox nuclear reactors will be published in full; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to publish the conclusions of his further examination of whether investment in energy conservation will offer a better rate of return to the Exchequer than investment in energy supply, following the commitment given in paragraph 87 of his Department's memorandum to the Sizewell inquiry, number DEN/S/3 (N.E.).

Mr. David Hunt: As I stated in paragraph 61 of the Government's response to the eighth report from the Select Committee on Energy — Session 1984-85 — this question is regularly addressed by my Department. I have no plans to publish a report on the matter.

Carbon Fibre Fishing Rods

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his policy towards the action of certain fishing tackle manufacturers in affixing electrical danger symbol warning stickers to carbon fibre rods; whether he has had any discussions with representatives of the manufacturers to secure the wider use of such stickers; and what information he has on the number and extent of personal injuries sustained by anglers in the last seven years where carbon fibre fishing rods have come into contact with high tension power lines and electricity cables.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government have not approached fishing tackle manufacturers on the use of warning stickers on carbon fibre rods, although I am pleased that some manufacturers do use that method of alerting anglers to the dangers when using carbon fibre rods near overhead lines. The Electricity Council and area boards, with Government encouragement, have mounted extensive publicity campaigns by means of the angling press, posters and a film, and the water authorities take steps to warn anglers using fishing waters where there may be a risk.

Over the seven years to 1985-86 my Department was notified of five injuries and one death which had resulted from contact between carbon fibre fishing rods and overhead lines. The injuries have generally consisted of burns to the hands and feet.

British Coal (Financial Limits)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the National Coal Board's financial limits for the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The NCB's recovery during 1985-86 following the NUM dispute put the board on a firmer foundation at the start of 1986-87. Lower oil prices have increased the competitive pressure on the industry. Nevertheless, I can confirm that the NCB's external financing limit for 1986-87 is £730 million, the same as the provisional figure in the 1986 public expenditure White Paper. The board's capital approval for 1986-87 is £650 million.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions Her Majesty's Government have informed (a) the European Commission and (b) the International Atomic Energy Agency that safeguarded plutonium had been withdrawn from safeguards under the article 14 provisions of the 1978 tripartite safeguards treaty (Cmnd. 6730).

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to the reply, 3 June 1986, c. 466]: Fifty three notifications of withdrawal have been made to the Euratom and IAEA safeguards authorities since article 14 came into force.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Weapon Tests

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to invite Soviet General Secretary Gorbachev to share with Her Majesty's Government Soviet technology designed to detect, identify and quantify nuclear weapon tests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Detection, identification and quantification of underground nuclear explosions must be based on seismology. However, Her Majesty's Government firmly believe that seismic methods are currently incapable of adequate detection and identification of nuclear explosions. Despite Soviet claims on the adequacy of its own seismic monitoring stations, we do not believe that Soviet techniques are demonstrably superior to those of the West. Consequently there seems little reason to believe that a technical bilateral exchange would lead to real progress in resolving Her Majesty's Government's concerns over verification. We regret that the Soviet Union has been dismissive of the recent United States offer to discuss a technique relevant to the verification of the threshold test ban treaty and peaceful nuclear explosions treaty.

Government-funded research in this field is proceeding and the results are made openly available to the international community. A United Kingdom paper was presented to the conference on disarmament in Geneva in July 1985. The United Kingdom also plays an active part in the work of the ad hoc group of scientific experts at the United Nations.

MCV 80 Vehicle

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence which companies were asked to tender for the transmission system of the MCV 80 vehicle; if any preference was given to United Kingdom companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The transmission system for MCV 80 armoured vehicle is one of several main assemblies being provided under subcontracts to the MOD's prime contractor, GKN Defence Industries. The system is an American design from Detroit Diesel Allison manufactured under licence in the United Kingdom by Perkins Engines. Perkins, which is responsible to GKN as the design authority for the complete MCV 80 power pack —engine plus transmission—selected the DDA design competitively, evaluating it against designs proposed by British industry. Criteria for the avaluation were the degree of technical confidence in the ability of each design to meet a rigorous performance specification against a tight timescale, and competitive pricing. The Perkins recommendation in favour of the DDA design was endorsed by GKN as part of its prime contractor responsibility. Production of the transmission system is now well under way.

Trident (Faslane Base)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the expenditure on jetties, roads and other infrastructure to be incurred by the Property Services Agency at the Faslane base is included in his estimates for the cost of the Trident programme.

Mr. Lee: Capital expenditure of this nature at the Clyde submarine base attributable to the Trident programme is included within the overall cost estimate of £9,869 million for the Trident programme.

Dartmoor Steering Group

Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received the annual report of the Dartmoor Steering Group for 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Yes. A copy of the report has today been placed in the Library. The steering group provides a valuable forum for the discussion of contentious issues relating to the military use of Dartmoor. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I are grateful to the members of the steering group and particularly its chairman, Sir Peter Stallard, for their efforts to reconcile the various conflicting interests.

RNAY Fleetlands

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the financial reasons for the proposed putting out to contract of support facilities at RNAY Fleetlands.

Mr. Freeman: To achieve any financial savings that may be possible.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the effect of the proposed reduction, by putting out to contract, of support services at RNAY Fleetlands on the unit costs of the rest of the establishment.

Mr. Freeman: The unit costs of the establishment's output will be reduced, if there are reductions in the costs of support services.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the budget of RNAY Fleetlands is spent on the purchase of spares; and what percentage is spent on labour costs.

Mr. Freeman: About 65 per cent. of the current budget represents the cost of direct material, including new equipment as well as spares. The latter cannot easily be identified separately. Staff costs are about 20 per cent. of the budget.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been carried out into whether financial savings could be obtained at RNAY Fleetlands by employing more staff on repair and maintenance and so reducing the cost of purchase of new spare parts.

Mr. Freeman: The staff numbers required and the costs of spare parts are kept under regular review. Actions are in hand to increase the number of staff engaged on the yard's core tasks by 20 in the current year, and to implement consultancy recommendations on means of reducing the spares bill.

Official Gifts

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much was spent by his Department on official gifts for visiting dignitaries, or for presentation by Ministers in each of the past five years.

Mr. Lee: The way in which our accounts are kept means that it is not possible for us to differentiate between the sums spent on official gifts presented to foreign dignitaries who visit the United Kingdom and on gifts made by Ministers and senior officers and officials from MOD to their hosts when they are themselves travelling abroad.

The tables, therefore, cover both categories. The figures for Ministers—table 2—are included in the totals in table 1.

Table 1: Total MOD expenditure on official gifts

Year	£
1981-82	7,496
1982-83	8,564
1983-84	14,223
1984-85	13,994
1985-86	*10,222

Table 2: Expenditure on official gifts presented by Ministers

Year	£
1981-82	2,449
1982-83	686
1983-84	1,527
1984-85	2,199
1985-86	1,711

* The return for non-ministerial gifts in 1985-86 are not yet complete, so that the figure shown understates the total expenditure in that year.

Lance Corporal Simon Cockton

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence has now led his Department to conclude that the helicopter carrying Lance Corporal Simon Cockton was shot down by a missile fired from the destroyer HMS Cardiff during the Falklands war; to what extent and in what specific respects this evidence was available to the Army coroner in November 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

SALT II

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence, whether he intends to meet the United States Defence Secretary to discuss the future of the SALT II agreement.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend expects to meet Mr. Weinberger again shortly to discuss a range of defence-related issues.

Royal Dockyards

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has consulted the European Commission about the compatibility with Community law of his proposal to bring in commercial managers to the royal dockyards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The Government are confident that the Dockyard Services Bill, which is designed to give effect to its plans to introduce commercial management to the royal dockyards, is compatible with European Community law.

Type 23 Frigate

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) by what means he will judge whether Swan Hunter is offering a competitive price for building the second type 23 boat;

(2) if the competitiveness of Swan Hunter's bid for the second type 23 will be judged against the bids he received from other yards competing for each of the third, fourth and fifth boat of this class.

Mr. Lee: The best and final tenders—which we have just received—in the competition for follow-on type 23 frigate orders will produce the basis of price and contract terms and conditions against which the single tender from Swan Hunter for type 23-02 will be evaluated.

Asbestos Removal

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the normal security clearance requirements for contract workers in a military establishment are being applied to workers on the contract to remove asbestos at building A. 1, COD Donnington.

Mr. Lee: A re-roofing contract which will include the removal of asbestos has been let for building F1 at Donnington. Work is expected to start shortly, and the normal security clearance requirements will apply to the contractor's work force. No contract has been let for building A1.

RAOC Central Depots

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what costings his Department made of the effect of implementation of the contracting-out of administrative functions at Royal Army Ordnance Corp's central depots; and if he will publish them.

Mr. Lee: No costings have yet been made. Feasibility studies at each of the affected depots must first be carried out to enable us to draw up specifications on the basis of which tenders can be issued. When tenders have been obtained and evaluated, their content will be "Commercial in Confidence" as is our usual practice. The details will not therefore be released; however, the evaluation will take proper account of the then current in-house costs, for comparison.

RN Ships (Defence)

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether action has been taken to improve the electronic defence and close-in weapons systems which protect Royal Navy ships from attack in the light of the attack on HMS Sheffield on 4 May 1982.

Mr. Stanley: Yes. I refer the right hon. Gentleman to "The Falklands Campaign: The Lessons", Cmnd. 8758—paragraphs 229, 230, 308 and 309—and the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985, Cmnd. 9430-1—paragraph 438.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in the light of the events of 4 May 1982, and the sinking of HMS Sheffield, his Department has updated the procedures which govern communications activity in war zones.

Mr. Stanley: A number of improvements have been, and are being, made in equipment and operating practices.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether action has been taken to improve the effectiveness of the Royal Navy's on board radar systems, in view of the fact that the aircraft which sank HMS Sheffield on 4 May 1982, had not been detected by the ship's radar.

Mr. Stanley: The difficulties encountered during the Falklands conflict in dealing with the threat of air attack on ships are being remedied by improvements to ship-borne surveillance, air warning, and tracker radar systems. Since one of the task force's greatest handicaps was the lack of airborne early warning, each of the operational carriers now carries a flight of Sea King AEW helicopters.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for defence what, during the Falklands conflict, was the nature of the communication between HMS Sheffield and Fleet HQ Northwood, at the time of the attack on 4 May 1982; and why it was necessary to undertake such communication when the ship's duties placed it under direct threat.

Mr. Stanley: It is often necessary for ships of a force to communicate with each other to ensure co-ordination of the various facets of an operation. The particular communication concerned was an urgent tactical signal to another ship in the task group which was outside the range of reliable line of sight communications. The threat was not judged to be such as to preclude a communication of this sort.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the events leading up to, and circumstances of, the attack upon HMS Sheffield on 4 May 1982.

Mr. Stanley: The attack on HMS Sheffield took place at about 1100 hours—1400 hours GMT—on 4 May 1982. At the time of the attack she was the south-westerly of three type 42 destroyers forming an air defence screen some 18 miles west of the main body of the task force.

Signs of the attack were first detected by HMS Glasgow—another of the three pickets—but, since this was the first experience of an Argentine airborne Exocet attack the aircraft's tactics, in particular flying in very low under radar cover thus giving only fleeting opportunities for detection, were not fully appreciated by all the ships concerned. There had also been spurious radar contacts on previous days. As a result, there was some doubt as to the validity of the contacts.

HMS Sheffield herself did not pick up the same warning signals on her electronic support measures (ESM) equipment because of interference from the SCOT—satellite communications transmitter — then being operated, or initially on her surveillance radar. By the time she appreciated the threat it was too late to respond. In the absence of airborne early warning, only a very few minutes were available between the first detection by HMS Glasgow and missile impact.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the Defence Export Services Organisation has a different remit and structure from the Defence Sales Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: No. The Defence Sales Organisation was renamed the Defence Export Services Organisation last year more accurately to reflect its role.

Central Ordnance Depots

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many industrial and non-industrial Civil Service jobs, listed by grade, would be lost under proposals to put out to contract work at the Central Ordnance Depot, Bicester.

Mr. Freeman: A recent feasibility study identified a total of 250 posts which could be affected by our proposals for contracting-out administrative functions at Central Ordnance Depot Bicester. However, until a full implementation study — which also embraces the associated garrison — has been completed, details of precise numbers and grades will not be available.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many industrial and non-industrial Civil Service jobs at the Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington, listed by grade, are involved in proposals to put out to contract work presently done by their occupants.

Mr. Freeman: It is our intention to conduct a feasibility study into contractorisation of administrative functions at COD Donnington and its associated garrison. An assessment of the areas suitable for contractorisation and the overall numbers likely to be affected will not be known until that study is completed.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the report on proposals to put out to contract industrial and non-industrial Civil Service jobs at the Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington, to be completed.

Mr. Freeman: We expect the feasibility study on contracting-out of administrative functions at COD Donnington to be complete by November 1986, and to embark on the normal consultations shortly thereafter.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence at what dates each consignment of cruise missiles arrived at USAF Greenham Common.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend the previous Secretary of State for Defence announced that the first cruise missiles had arrived on 14 November 1983. He also stated on 17 January 1984 that details of the timing of further deliveries would not be announced. It has been our practice to set out the updated situation in the annual Statement on the Defence Estimates.

HMS Otter

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the repairs required on HMS Otter; where these repairs are to be done; and what is the estimated cost of these repairs.

Mr. Lee: HMS Otter is currently undergoing refit at Humber Shiprepairers. A replacement engine frame supplied to the refitting yard under arrangements with my Department and fitted into the submarine has proved defective; no responsibility for this defect rests with Humber Shiprepairers. It will be necessary to remove this frame and fit a further replacement. This work is being undertaken in the refitting yard. The cost of this work, for which a firm price has been agreed, is commercially confidential.

Devonport Dockyard

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the reasons given to him by the Trafalgar House company for its decision not to tender for the management contract at Devonport dockyard.

Mr. Lee: It is not for my Department to comment on the commercial judgment of any company.

Departmental Houses

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any further plans to release to local authorities empty homes owned by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Where circumstances permit, it is MOD policy to offer houses which are likely to be vacant for periods of at least six months to local authorities on the condition that the authority undertakes to return the properties with vacant possession at the end of the term of letting.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many evictions from property owned by his Department in Fareham have been pursued following marriage break-ups or death of spouse employed by the Royal Navy in the last year.

Mr. Freeman: During the year 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1986 no such evictions were pursued.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many evictions from property owned by his Department in Gosport have been pursued following marriage break-ups or death of spouse employed by the Royal Navy in the last year.

Mr. Freeman: During the year 1 June 1986 to 31 May 1986 one warrant for the eviction of an estranged wife was obtained. However, eviction was not necessary as the person was rehoused by the Portsmouth city council. No evictions were pursued following the death of a spouse.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many evictions from property owned by his Department in Portsmouth have been pursued following marriage break-ups or death of spouses employed by the Royal Navy in the last year.

Mr. Freeman: During the year 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1986 two warrants for the eviction of estranged wives were obtained. However, in both cases eviction was not necessary as the persons were rehoused by the Portsmouth city council. No evictions were pursued following the death of a spouse.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many houses owned by his Department in Portsmouth are occupied by non-service households;

(2) how many houses owned by his Department in Gosport are occupied by non-service households;

(3) how many houses owned by his Department in Fareham are occupied by non-service households.

Mr. Freeman: On 31 March, the most recent date for which details are readily available, there were 289 service-MOD houses in the Portsmouth-Fareham-Gosport area occupied by non-service households. As these three areas are treated as one for administrative reasons, only an overall answer is possible.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many houses owned by his Department are currently empty in Portsmouth;

(2) how many houses owned by his Department are currently empty in Gosport;

(3) how many houses owned by his Department are currently empty in Fareham.

Mr. Freeman: On 31 March 1986, the most recent date for which details are readily available, there were 728 service-MOD houses empty in the Portsmouth-Gosport-Fareham area. As these three areas are treated as one for administrative reasons, only an overall answer is possible.

WALES

Homelessness

9. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to seek to reduce the number of Welsh households accommodated by local councils in bed and breakfast hotels.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is for local housing authorities to decide how to use the resources available to them but the Government's code of guidance recommends that local authorities place homeless people in bed and breakfast accommodation only as a last resort for as short a period as possible.

NHS Staffing

12. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales by how much the nursing staff, doctors, ancillary staff and after-care staff within the National Health Service has been increased in Cardiff and Cardiff West in particular since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Figures are not available in the form requested, but in the South Glamorgan health authority between 1979 and 1985, front line staff including nurses and doctors have increased by 12·1 per cent. while other hospital staff, including ancillary staff, have increased by 4·6 per cent.

Health Authorities (Savings)

16. Mr Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what savings will accrue to each of the health authorities in Wales from (a) the fall in the rate of inflation and (b) the fall in the cost of energy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is not possible to provide definitive figures in the form requested.

Educational Resources

17. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with local education authorities in Wales regarding the allocation of educational resources.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has had consultations relating to the allocation of resources for local authority services, including education, with the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance. There have also been consultations with the Welsh Counties Committee and the Welsh Joint Education Committee.

Severn Barrage

18. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about the implications for the Welsh economy and employment in Wales of a Severn barrage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have received a small number of representations on this aspect of the Severn barrage proposal. The report of the Severn tidal power group is being considered by the Government and a response will be made in due course by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Labour Statistics

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many unemployed persons were registered at the local employment offices of Wales in January; and what were the corresponding figures for each January since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Consistent figures of claimant unemployment by local employment office areas are available only between October 1982 and August 1985. The figures for January 1983 to 1985 are given in the following tables.

Figures after April 1983 reflect the effects of the 1983 Budget provisions for some men aged 60 and over who no longer have to sign on at an unemployment benefit office.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were unemployed in each district authority area in Wales in January; and what were the corresponding figures for each January since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Consistent figures of unemployment for districts in the new ward-based series are available only from June 1983. The figures for January 1984 to 1986 are shown in the following table.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the population of working age in each of the parliamentary constituencies of Wales was unemployed in January; and what were the corresponding figures for each January since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is not available for individual constituencies.

Government Training Schemes

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many young people in each parliamentary constituency in Wales are currently engaged on Manpower Services Commission/YTS schemes;

(2) how many people in each parliamentary constituency in Wales are at present engaged on Manpower Services Commission schemes.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available for individual constituencies.

Radiotherapy Services

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to publish the review into the provision of radiotherapy services at Singleton hospital, Swansea and Velindre hospital, Cardiff when the review team have completed their work.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The review of the centrally funded radiotherapy services at Velindre and Singleton hospitals is an internal matter being undertaken to ensure that appropriate levels of service are provided. It is not proposed to publish a report.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many school leavers under 18 years old were claiming unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit or national insurance credits at unemployment benefit offices in each parliamentary constituency in Wales in January; and what were the corresponding figures for each January since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Consistent figures of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies in the new ward-based series are available only from June 1983. The figures for January 1984 to 1986 are shown in the following table.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the extent of extra resources promised to facilitate the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education examination in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Considerable resources have already been made available, but the Government have undertaken to examine, as a matter of priority, the case for some additional resources.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received concerning the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Representations have been received from 18 Members of Parliament, three county councils, one local education authority, the Local Authorities Committee of the WJEC, the Assistant Masters' and Mistresses' Association, two county groups of secondary headteachers, two county branches of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, the governing bodies of 23 county secondary schools, 3 federations of parent teacher associations, 13 individual parent teachers associations, 14 heads of school departments, five teachers, one school governor, three school associations, one teachers' organisation, one school parents' association, the Welsh SDP Conference, one constituency party, the PAT (Wales) Committee and 165 individuals, all requesting postponement.

Teachers' Dispute

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning the outcome of the negotiations in connection with the teachers' dispute, insofar as education in Wales is concerned.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A 5½ per cent. pay rise for 1986-87 for teachers in England and Wales was agreed at the Burnham Primary and Secondary Committee on 9 May. The agreement was reached on the understanding that it would not prejudice the eventual outcome of the talks which are taking place, with the help of ACAS, about a revised pay structure and conditions of service for teachers. As an integral part of the 9 May agreement all of the teachers' unions involved in the dispute agreed to end the disruption of work in the schools.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Servants (Briefcases)

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is (a) the current cost of each type of standard security case provided to civil servants and (b) the annual cost of providing such cases over each of the last five years.

Mr. Brooke: (a) Four types of case are provided at prices ranging from £65 to £106 depending on the degree of security required.

(b) Her Majesty's Stationery Office estimates the annual costs at:

1981-82	48,100
1982-83	56,500
1983-84	68,600
1985-86	77,900

(c) These figures include the cost of the security locks which I regret were not included in the answer given to my hon. Friend's question on 9 May. If the cost of the locks had been included, those figures would have been approximately:

1981-82	96,000
1982-83	132,000
1983-84	152,000
1984-85	180,000

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors account for the rise in the annual cost of providing civil servants with briefcases (a) between 1981-82 and 1982-83 and (b) between 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: There is no central record of any factors leading to a real growth in demand. However, the prices paid for the cases under Her Majesty's Stationery Office contracts increased between 12 and 16 per cent. between 1981-82 and 1982-83, and between 2 and 15 per cent. between 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will review the security standard and quality of briefcases and security cases provided to civil servants.

Mr. Brooke: All products offered by Her Majesty's Stationery Office are regularly reviewed to ensure that they continue to provide the best value for money in the light of technical developments and other factors.

Pensions

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the saving after five years, 10 years, 20 and 40 years of phasing out the entitlement to receive lump sums free of tax in occupational pension schemes after the current financial year, taxing at standard rate thereafter the element accruing in respect of future service.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The yield would depend on assumptions made about the amounts of lump sums which will be paid over the next 40 years, changes in the basic rate of income tax and the formula used to calculate the proportions of lump sum which would have accrued in respect of service after April 1987. An indication of the eventual yield from such a measure is that a tax at 29 per cent. on lump sums on retirement would yield about £850 million in 1986-87.

Income Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost in 1985-86 of administering income tax; and what is the latest estimate of the dates of completion of the programme of computerisation, distinguishing between installation of hardware and preparation of software.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The cost of administering income tax in 1985-86 was £793·1 million.

The computerisation of PAYE (COP) and of schedule D work (CODA) is on schedule for completion in 1988. Five (out of eleven) regional processing centres are already operational. Software enhancements to the basic computer systems will continue throughout the implementation phase and beyond.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his answer to the hon. Member for Kensington, Official Report, 3 April 1985, column 679, showing revenues from higher rate income tax each year since 1978-79; and what is the current cost of collection of this revenue.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Updated estimates for 1983-84 to 1985-86 and an estimate for 1986-87 are as shown. The current cost of administering higher rate income tax is about £13 million.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made any assessment of the impact of North sea oil and gas on the United Kingdom economy and on United Kingdom economic performance in relation to other Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom economy benefits significantly from North sea oil and gas; the direct contribution to GNP was worth about 5 per cent. in 1985, and both Government revenues and the balance of payments have been strengthened. It has also enabled the United Kingdom to build up overseas assets which will yield continuing benefits as oil production declines.

EC (Currency Unit)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of exchange for the European Economic Community European currency unit to the United States dollar was assumed in the 1986 European Economic Community budget approved by the Council and in that passed by the Assembly.

Mr. Brooke: The rate of exchange for the European currency unit to the United States dollar assumed in the 1986 European Communities budget was one dollar to 1·20 ecus.

Unemployment (Scotland)

Dr. Godman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimate of the total cost to his Department of unemployment in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. MacGregor: The overall cost of unemployment and supplementary benefit paid to the unemployed is estimated to be £5·6 billion in 1986-87. In addition, it is estimated that £1·15 billion will be paid in housing benefit, a benefit which can continue to be paid if the recipient finds employment. A regional breakdown of this expenditure would be available only at disproportionate cost. It is not possible to estimate the tax revenue forgone.

Family Income

Mr. Hickmet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much a married man with a non-working wife and (a) two children and (b) three children needs to gross before being better off than the same man who is unemployed and in receipt of all benefits available; what effect a reduction of the basic rate of tax to 25p would have; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Refunds

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the cost of the refunds due to the miscalculation of tax relief given on any lump sum exceeding £50,000 paid since 6 April 1982; how many individuals are involved; and what is the average refund due.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Covenants (Abuse)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Inland Revenue investigation into alleged abuse of the convenants procedure in a Scottish Roman Catholic diocese.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 22 May 1986, c. 308]: The Inland Revenue makes regular checks on claims by churches and other charities for repayment of tax deducted from covenant payments, but I cannot comment on what may or may not have occurred in any individual case.

Income Tax and National Insurance

Mr. Sydney Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the total percentage tax liability, including national insurance contributions, of the gross wage of (a) a single person, (b) a married person, (c) a married person with one child, and (d) a married person with two children each earning £40, £60, £80, £100, £120, £140, £160, £180 and £200 per week, as a result of his 1986 Budget proposals and as compared with the 1984 Budget proposals and the 1978 Budget proposals.

Mr. Lamont Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 4 June 1986]: The table shows income tax plus national insurance contributions (less child benefit where appropriate) as a percentage of gross income for the family types and years affected by the Budgets specified. National insurance contributions have been taken to be at contracted-in rates and for the married couples it is assumed that only the husband is earning. Negative figures in the table indicate cases where child benefit exceeds liability to income tax and national insurance contributions.

Capital Gains Tax Retirement Relief

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated annual costs of the capital gains tax retirement relief.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Insurance

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the additional cost in 1986-87 of income tax relief for class 4 national insurance contributions if the upper annual limit were abolished.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 5 June 1986]: If the upper profit limit for class 4 national insurance contributions were removed and tax relief were available on one half of all class 4 NIC, the additional cost of the tax relief for 1986-87 would be about £40 million.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sewage Sludge

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give detailed figures of the concentration of (a) inorganic heavy metals, particularly mercury and cadmium, (b) organic compounds, particularly polychlorinated biphenyls and dieldrin and (c) man-made synthetic contaminants in samples of sewage sludge dumped in the coastal waters of the United Kingdom, with particular reference to the Thames estuary, the Clyde estuary, Liverpool bay and Merseyside, and the Severn estuary.

Mr. Gummer: Specific information on levels of mercury, cadmium, polychlorinated biphenyls and dieldrin found in sewage sludges produced by the water authorities which use the sites in question is set out in the table. All sewage sludges contain very small traces of a wide range of man-made synthetic contaminants.

(parts per million, dry weight)

Site	Total mercury	Total cadmium	Polychlorinated biphenyls	Dieldrin
Thames estuary	4·8	19·0	0·15	0·12
Clyde estuary	3·2	8·0	0·32	0·14
Liverpool bay	5·0	12·5	0·13	0·09
Severn estuary	4·6	10·0	0·08	0·24

Notes:

1. Figures are for total mercury and cadmium as separate data on inorganic mercury and cadmium are not available.
2. Total mercury and total cadmium levels are based on concentrations in sewage sludges licensed for disposal in the areas shown in 1985 and 1986.
3. For polychlorinated biphenyls and dieldrin, the figures are based on levels found in the last (1981-82) survey of sewage sludges produced by the relevant water authorities, except for those for the Clyde which relate to sludges licensed for disposal in 1985-86.

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether there are any pesticides on sale in the United Kingdom approved by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides wholly or partly on data made available by the Industrial Bio-Test Laboratory.

Mrs. Fenner: There are no products on sale in the United Kingdom whose clearance under the pesticides safety precautions scheme (PSPS) depended wholly on data supplies from Industrial Bio-test Laboratories (IBT). There are a number of products on sale whose clearance was originally based in part on data from IBT but in most cases the IBT data have been validated or replaced by new data. In the case of "Maloran 50WP" (active ingredient chlorbromuron), the supplying company does not wish to retain PSPS clearance and the product's clearance has therefore been withdrawn with effect from 1 July 1986. Clearance for the use of alachlor was also supported in part by IBT data. There was no suggestion that the data were fraudulent, but it was outdated. The Advisory Committee on Pesticides recommended that a review should be carried out. A replacement data package has been received and the review is underway.

Cereal Production

Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to promote alternative use of land now used for cereal production; and if he is monitoring such changes in land use in the rest of the Community.

Mr. Jopling: We have urged the Community to examine the possibility of a voluntary set-aside arrangement for cereals. Data on changes in land use in the rest of the Community may be obtained from the Commission's annual reports "The Agricultural Situation in the Community", copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Farm Prices

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average annual farm price increase agreed by the Council of Ministers since 1979.

Mr. Gummer: The average annual increase in CAP common support prices agreed by the Council of Ministers since 1979 is 3·5 per cent.

Food (Self-sufficiency)

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the change in the level of United Kingdom self-sufficiency for all food consumed from 1973 to 1985; and what is the comparable figure for all temperate food products in the same period.

Mrs. Fenner: The estimated level of United Kingdom self-sufficiency for all food consumed increased from 50 per cent. in 1973 to 62 per cent. in 1985. The comparable figures for all temperate food products are 60 per cent. and 80 per cent. The 1985 figures are provisional.

Community Expenditure

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average annual figure for the proportion of total Community expenditure absorbed by agriculture since 1979.

Mr. Jopling: The average percentage share of total Community expenditure taken by the common agricultural policy since 1979 (1980 to 1986 inclusive) is 69 per cent.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act, how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Jopling: My Department has made 36 registrations under the Data Protection Act.

Two people are involved to a significant extent in implementing the legislation in my Department.

My officials have estimated that the total cost of conforming with the eight data protection principles will amount to £100,000. This estimate does not include the cost of the small amount of time expended by a large number of staff located throughout the Department who have provided information to the centre to facilitate the registration process. The annual cost of continuing to conform with the eight principles, after 11 November 1987, when the subject access provisions come into force, is estimated at £40,000.

Badgers

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the savings, in a full year, from the recent modifications of the badger control operations.

Mrs. Fenner: Savings in operational costs resulting from recent modifications to badger control operations are estimated at broadly £300,000 in a full year.

Trout and Salmon

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has as to the number of fishermen employed at net fisheries for migrating trout and salmon on each of the major salmon rivers and estuaries in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Gummer: The only information available to me relates to the number of persons, in each water authority area, who were licensed to use commercial instruments to fish for salmon or migratory trout or who were authorised to assist in the working of the licensed instrument.

Radiation

Mr. Hancock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring takes place of radioactive charges in the Channel.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Swine Fever

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the recent outbreak of swine fever; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The first outbreak in Shropshire has been linked to the feeding to pigs of scraps of imported pigmeat products. However, we have not so far been able to establish the source of the recent outbreaks.

We are discussing in Brussels possible ways of improving the effectiveness of Community measures against this disease. In the meantime, the Community has accepted the measures taken and our exports are substantially unaffected.

Food Quality

Mr. Pike asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he takes to monitor the quality of food.

Mrs. Fenner: There is comprehensive legislation regulating the safety quality and labelling of food. In addition, my Department carries out regular and ad hoc surveys under the aegis of the steering group on food surveillance. The results of these surveys are published both in the scientific literature and by HMSO in food surveillance papers: 16 have been published to date.

THE ARTS

Portrait Photographers (Copyright)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about (i) the simplification of language in the Copyright Act 1956 and (ii) the rights of portrait photographers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Responsibility for copyright lies with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I have not received any representations on either matter.

Objects in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will give the respective dates of the laying before Parliament of the five statements covering the financial years 1980-81 to 1984-85 inclusive, in compliance with section 9(6) of the National Heritage Act 1980; whether those statements specified particulars of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied in individual cases of acceptances of objects and land in lieu of such taxes; and what is his policy towards the inclusion of similar particulars in such statements in the future.

Mr. Luce: The dates of the five statements laid before Parliament are as follows:

	Date
1980-81	7 December 1981
1981-82	22 October 1982
1982-83	12 May 1983
1983-84	31 July 1984

These statements all specified particulars of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied in individual cases. A similar statement was laid for 1985-86 on 16 May 1986 by the Secretary of State for the Environment. This was accompanied by a press notice from the Office of Arts and Libraries. Future statements will include similar particulars.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Warley East on 8 April, Official Report, columns 87-88, he is now able to give details of the individual amounts of tax satisifed in each of the cases listed by him in which objects and land were accepted in lieu of capital transfer tax during the financial year ended 31 March.

Mr. Luce: Yes. It has now been established that no breach of confidentiality is involved in giving the individual figures. The complete list of items accepted during the period is as follows:

Work of art/land	Amount of tax satisfied £
Photographs associated with the late Marquess Curzon of Kedleston	10,150
Chattels at Mount Edgecumbe	327,132
Collar chain of a KCMG	750
Land at Pond Wood	49,000
Chattels at Hagley Hall	210,000
Land at Coldharbour Common	12,500
Correspondence of Sir Arthur Bryant	13,750
Bronze sculpture by Hans Arp	15,100
Archive from the Dukes of Portland and Newcastle	1,367,600
Nine paintings by Ben Nicholson	187,825

Residual expenditure of £172,900 was incurred during the period. This was to pay the balance owing on two previously accepted items, the Geoffrey Keynes collection —£168,230—and a bust of Lord Somers—£4,670.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether, in the light of the letters to him of 24 March, 22 April, 19 May and 28 May from the hon. Member for Warley, East, he is now able to give a full list of the relevant references in the Official Report of those occasions on which the amounts of estate duty or capital transfer tax satisfied by the acceptance of objects and land in respect of individual cases have been specified in answers during the period between 23 June 1980, Official Report, columns 3-4, and 26 April 1985, Official Report, column 562, inclusive.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Wheelchair Dwellings

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dwellings, purpose-built to accommodate wheelchairs, presently exist within the following districts of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's south eastern region; Dundonald, Newtownards 1, Newtownards 2 and Newtownbreda.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

Wheelchair dwellings provided by:

	NIHE	Registered housing association
Dundonald (now known as Castlereagh 1)	1	2
Newtownards 1	3	2
Newtownbreda (now known as Castlereagh 2)	0	0

No information is available about private sector wheelchair accommodation in the four districts.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dwellings, specially converted to accommodate wheelchairs, presently exist within the following districts of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's south eastern region; Dundonald, Newtownards 1, Newtownards 2 and Newtownbreda.

Mr. Needham: No dwellings in the Housing Executive's stock in the four districts have been specially converted to accommodate wheelchairs and no such conversions have been carried out by registered housing associations in these districts.

Information is not available as to the number of dwellings in the private sector in the four districts which have been specially converted to accommodate wheelchairs.

Dog Licences

Mr. Dover asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what lessons have been learned from the trial period of dog licences at £5 per annum introduced in 1985.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Maghaberry Prison (Strip Searches)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison in Maghaberry in April and May, respectively; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance on remand, attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons.

Mr. Scott: During April 1986, 51 searches were carried out on 31 prisoners: 14 prisoners were searched once, 14 were searched twice and three prisoners were searched on three occasions. During May 1986, 38 searches were carried out on 25 prisoners: 14 prisoners were searched once, 10 were searched twice and one prisoner was searched on four occasions. No prohibited article was found during these searches and no prisoner refused to be searched. Searches were carried out in the following circumstances:

	April	May
First admission on remand or whilst awaiting trial	6	7
First admission on sentence or on final discharge	29	17
Attending remand courts	—	2
Attending trial	2	—
Bail court appearances	9	7
Going on or returning from home leave	5	2
Inter-prison visits	—	2
Attendance at police station (section 16 Prison Act (NI) 1953)	—	1
Total	51	38

War Emergency Headquarters

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in what way the plans for zone headquarters in Northern Ireland relate to the three war headquarters referred to in the answer of 17 March, Official Report, columns 33 and 34.

Mr. Scott: For civil defence purposes Northern Ireland (region No. 11) is not divided into zones.

The three purpose-built protected centres I referred to in my reply of 17 March will accommodate the regional Government headquarters, a reserve team and four area emergency centres — equivalent to county emergency centres in England and Wales.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Enterprise Allowance

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to how many recipients of the enterprise allowance who were also in receipt of housing benefit had the enterprise allowance treated as unearned income for the purposes of entitlement of housing benefit; and in how many cases it was treated as a business receipt;

(2) if he has any plans to compensate those who have been financially disadvantaged by the decision to treat the enterprise allowance as unearned income under the housing benefit regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: No such information is collected centrally as the day-to-day administration of the housing benefit scheme is the statutory responsibility of local authorities. The guidance issued by the Department to local authorities is that enterprise allowance should be regarded as a business receipt for the purposes of deciding the income of housing benefit applicants—paragraph 7.15 of the housing benefits guidance manual, a copy of which is in the Library. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, he should raise it in the first instance with the local authority concerned.

Unclaimed Benefits

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the amount of social security benefits left unclaimed on an annual basis, distinguishing between the main benefits.

Mr. Major: The following table sets out the latest available published figures:

Benefit	Year	Amount Unclaimed £ million
Supplementary Benefit	1981	760
Family Income Supplement	1981-82	57
One Parent Benefit	1982-83	18

First estimates of unclaimed housing benefits, and further estimates for supplementary benefit, family income supplement and one parent benefit, will be available shortly.

Chiropody

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what qualifications are required for persons intending to practice chiropody.

Mr. Hayhoe: Only those wishing to practise chiropody in the National Health Service require a qualification. This is that they must satisfy the registration requirements laid down by the Chiropodists Board of the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine. Currently the only qualification accepted for state registration is the three-year diploma course of the Society of Chiropodists.

Social Security Payments (Newham)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of income in the London borough of Newham is derived from social security payments; and what is the national percentage.

Mr. Major: In 1984 approximately 16 per cent. of national household disposable income came from social security benefits. No comparable figure is available for the London borough of Newham.

Benefits

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of claimants in receipt of (a) sickness benefit, (b) invalidity benefit, (c) industrial disablement benefit and (d) non-contributory invalidity pension, housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension or severe disablement allowance for the latest available year at each of the Bradford offices of his Department at Westfield house, Law Russell house and 373 Leeds road.

Mr. Major: The number of claimants in receipt of sickness and invalidity benefit and severe disablement allowance as at 6 May 1986, and in receipt of industrial disablement benefit as at 11 February 1986—the latest dates for which information is available—at the Department's offices at Westfield House (Bradford (West) office), Law Russell House (Bradford (South) office) and 373 Leeds Road (Bradford (East) office) is as follows:

	Sickness and Invalidity Benefit	Severe Disablement Allowance	Industrial Disablement Benefit
Bradford West	2,393	399	328
Bradford South	2,537	731	413
Bradford East	2,095	496	418

Separate records are not kept of the number of claimants in receipt of sickness and invalidity benefit.

Non-contributory invalidity pension and housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension were replaced by severe disablement allowance from 29 November 1984.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many claimant couples with children were in receipt of (a) unemployment benefit only, (b) supplementary benefit only and (c) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit for the latest available year at each of the Bradford offices of his Department, Westfield House, Law Russell House and 373 Leeds Road;

(2) how many claimants are in receipt of (a) unemployment benefit only (b) supplementary benefit only and (c) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit for the latest available year at each of the Bradford offices of his Department at Westfield House, Law Russell house and 373 Leeds road, excluding pensioner claimants and claimants with dependent children.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available. Statistics are not kept routinely so that the information requested could be obtained only by a special exercise which would be disproportionately expensive.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of (a) single payments and (b) urgent needs payments, both weekly and one-off, paid to claimants who are (i) under pensionable age and not required to register to work, (ii) under pensionable age and required to register for work and (iii) over pensionable age.

Mr. Major: For the year to 8 April 1986 the information requested is as follows:

(000s)

	Under pensionable age and not required to register for work	Under pensionable age and required to register for work	Over pensionable age
Number of awards under the Single Payments Regulations	1,787	2,079	508
Number of awards under the Urgent Cases Regulations:
Weekly	7	6	*
One-off	88	178	5

* Less than 1,000.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total cost in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland of payments to the unemployed in each year since 1977 of (i) unemployment benefit, (ii) supplementary allowances and (iii) housing benefits, respectively.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the numbers of unemployed people in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland, by entitlement to benefit for each year since 1979 and distinguishing between (i) unemployment benefit only, (ii) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit, (iii) supplementary benefit only, (iv) no benefit and (v) housing benefit.

Mr. Major: The table shows the numbers of unemployed people in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow and (b) Scotland in November each year since 1979 receiving the the following benefits: (i) unemployment benefit only (ii) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefits (iii) supplementary benefit only (iv) no benefit. Similar information for Strathclyde could only be obtained by a special exercise which would be disproportionately expensive. The information is not available for housing benefit.

Quarterly Count of Unemployed Claimants.

UB = Unemployment benefit.

SA = Supplementary allowance.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what happens to the benefit rights of those claimants who are required to sign on quarterly but who fail to turn up to register.

Mr. Newton: If a claimant who is required to sign quarterly at an unemployment benefit office fails to do so, he loses entitlement to benefit because he has not satisfied the conditions for receiving it. However, departmental instructions require staff to interview any such claimant, at the local office or by home visit, to ascertain the reasons for his failure to sign so that benefit payments can be continued if, for example, the claimant is found to be sick and so that he may be warned about the implications if he continues to fail to sign without good reason.

Retirement Pensions

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 15 May to the hon. Member for Barking, Official Report, columns 527-530, whether the retirement pension of those 5,733 people recorded as people in transit will be paid at current or frozen rates.

Mr. Major: The 5,733 people shown as "Countries not recorded (people in transit)" were known to be moving from one country to another but their new countries of residence were not included in the Department's computer records at the time when the count was taken. Whether their pensions will be payable at current or frozen rates will depend upon the new country of residence.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Barking, 15 May, Official Report, columns 527-530, how 828 retirement pensioners whose address is not known can receive a retirement pension abroad; and into what categories they fall.

Mr. Major: As these 828 pensioners have not provided their current addresses the appropriate rate of pension cannot be decided nor can payment be made. Information on the categories into which they fall is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Barking, 15 May, Official Report, columns 527-530, if he will set out the rules governing payment of benefit in those countries where some benefits are paid at current and others at partially unfrozen rates; and how many of the people listed as resident in each of those countries received their pension at current and at partially unfrozen rates.

Mr. Major: Current rates of pension are payable in all the countries listed as those where benefits are paid at current or partially unfrozen rates, except in Bermuda,

Jamaica, and United States of America. In these three countries all increases since the respective agreements came into effect are payable, that is, from these dates:

	Date
Bermuda	1 November 1969
Jamaica	1 October 1972
United States of America	28 September 1969

In consequence, the great majority of pensions in these three countries are paid at current rates, but the precise numbers of people receiving full rate pensions are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Barking, 15 May, Official Report, columns 527-530, if he will separate the figure for the average pension paid in countries where no increases are paid into the average paid to single people, to married men and to married women, respectively.

Mr. Major: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Barking, 15 May, Official Report, columns 527-530, whether the numbers of beneficiaries listed include dependants; and if he will list separately the number of dependants.

Mr. Major: The numbers of beneficiaries listed do not include dependants. The number of these would be small, but precise figures are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Injuries Scheme

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have (a) claimed and (b) received disablement benefit under the industrial injuries scheme for (i) less than 14 per cent. loss of faculty and (ii) 14 per cent. and above loss of faculty for each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Information is not held in the form requested. It is estimated that between 80 per cent. and 90 per cent. of disablement benefit awards are for disablement below 14 per cent.

Rehabilitation Centres

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many alcoholic rehabilitation centres there are in London; if he will list them; and how they are funded.

Mr. Whitney: We are aware of the following residential rehabilitation facilities for problem drinkers in London:

B-Sharp (Bow)
Downham Lodge (N16)
Grieg House Alcoholic Assessment Unit (Poplar)
Hartley House Alcohol Project (Ealing)
Milliken House Alcohol Project (Ealing)
Spitalfields Crypt (E1)
West London Cyrenians (W11)
Alcoholics Recovery Project — facilities in NW1, SW12, SE5, SW4 (2), SE6 (2), SE4
Mount Carmel Hostel for Recovering Alcoholics (Streatham)
St. Luke's Alcoholic Rehabilitation Centre (SE11)
The Richmond Fellowship (Purley)
Turning Point (Camberwell)
Charter Clinic (SW3)
The Oakhurst Centre (SW7)

We understand that there are some 38 non-residential facilities in London run by non-statutory bodies which offer a range of services including, in some cases, a rehabilitation service. Long-term support is also provided through out-patient facilities of the National Health Service. Information on the funding of individual facilities is not held centrally.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many drug rehabilitation centres there are in London; if he will list them; and how such centres are funded.

Mr. Whitney: We are aware of the following residential rehabilitation facilities in London:

Alwin House (W11)
Bowden House (Harrow on the Hill)
The Charter Clinic (NW3)
The Charter Clinic (SW3)
City Roads (EC1)
Crescent House (W2)
Deliverance International (E12)
Elisabeth House (SW10)
Oak Lodge (SW15)
Parole Release Scheme (SW11)
Phoenix House (SE23)
The Priory (Roehampton)
Project 85 (Tooting)
Pye Barn Trust (SW4)
ROMA (W4)
Two Three Five Project (SW17)

We understand that there are about 45 non-residential facilities in London run by non-statutory bodies which offer a range of services including in some cases a rehabilitation service. Long-term support is also provided in out-patient facilities in the National Health Service. Information on the funding of individual facilities is not held centrally.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the specialist centres in the United Kingdom for the treatment of cystic fibrosis; and whether he has any plans for the establishment of further centres.

Mr. Whitney: Information on units specialising in cystic fibrosis is not collected centrally. The intensity of cystic fibrosis, and therefore its treatment, can vary and there is some difference in medical opinion as to whether, for the majority of cases, any benefits arising from regional or other centres would outweigh the difficulties and disruption involved in treating children far from their homes. It is for health authorities, in consultation with the consultants concerned, to determine how best services for children and for older sufferers from cystic fibrosis should be organised, and where they should be located.

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the present eligibility criteria for part-time students receiving social security benefits.

Mr. Newton: An unemployed person who wishes to claim supplementary benefit while studying part-time must satisfy the following conditions: the course is for not more than 21 hours per week of supervised study and instruction; he is prepared to leave the course if work becomes available for him; he has been unemployed and in receipt of benefit for three months, and during this period his study has been limited—if 19 or under—to 12 hours per week or less, or—if over 19—to any course which is designated part-time.

New Hospitals

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, of the new hospitals opened since 1979, what percentage of beds are not yet in use.

Mr. Whitney: Information collected centrally relates to hospital schemes costing £2 million or more to build; in the 81 schemes completed and fully commissioned since the beginning of 1979, less than 2 per cent. of beds are not yet in use out of a total of almost 15,500 new beds provided for National Health Service patients. These beds will be brought into use following the implementation of planned changes within the local pattern of health services.

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, of the new hospitals started in England, Wales and Scotland since 1979, how many were approved before that date; and how many hospitals have been approved since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: Since 1979, 74 new hospital schemes each costing in excess of £5 million have been started on site in Great Britain. Of these 22 were approved before 1979 and 52 after.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals have been closed since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: For the latest information available I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 3 March at column 62.

Family Credit

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the compliance costs of his proposals for family credit.

Mr. Newton: Precise costs will depend on the operational details, which have not yet been finalised.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what form the consultation on the payment mechanism for family credit will take; which organisations are being consulted; and when he hopes to announce the outcome of the consultation.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 19 May that he was prepared to reconsider the mechanism by which family credit is to be paid and that he would be inviting the CBI, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Women's National Commission to discussions. We shall also have regard to the other representations which have been made on this issue including those expressed during the consideration of the current Social Security Bill. We shall announce the outcome of the reconsideration as soon as possible.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the implications of European legislation or of decisions by Community institutions with regard to any decision by Her Majesty's Government as to whether family credit should be payable on a sexually defined basis.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 23 May c. 382]: I understand that the present provisions on equal treatment in social security Council directive 79/7/EEC, would not apply to family credit.

Data Protection Act (Registration)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Whitney: A total of 31 individual registrations were made in respect of systems in the Department. There are currently 15 staff wholly or mainly engaged on the implementation of the Data Protection Act and a number of other staff spend a smaller part of their time on this work. Departmental working practices and procedures are such that the Department was, in effect, already complying with the requirements of data protection principles 1 to 6 and 8, and any additional costs have not been significant. The cost of implementing the seventh principle will depend on the rate at which the new facility is taken up, and a reliable estimate is not possible. The Department will continue to respond sympathetically to any requests for information and will comply with the subject access provisions of the Data Protection Act in due course.

RHA Chairmen (Appointments)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will announce the appointment of regional health authority chairmen from 1 August.

Mr. Fowler: The terms of office of 11 of the 14 regional health authority chairmen expire on 31 July 1986. I am glad to say that all 11 of them have accepted my invitation to continue to serve in this most important position.

Regional health authorities, under the leadership of their chairmen, are playing a key role in carrying through the improvements in NHS management which are already leading to better services for patients and better value for money. I should like to place on record the Government's appreciation of the excellent work done by health authorities, their chairmen, and their staff to further these aims.

The 11 regional health authority chairmen are being reappointed for varying terms so as to phase the appointments in the future. The appointments are as follows:

Breast Cancer

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities have multi-disciplinary teams capable of conducting clinical, radiological and histopathological diagnostic assessment of mammographic abnormalities.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

It is, however, part of the remit of Professor Sir Patrick Forrest's expert working group on breast cancer screening to consider the back-up services for the assessment of abnormalities that would be necessary to support any breast cancer screening service based on mammography.

Social Security Payments

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of incomes in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow are derived from social security payments; and what is the national percentage.

Mr. Major: Percentage information on Scotland is not available, but I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 22 April at columns 138 and 139 and 30 April at columns 431 and 432. I regret that information on Strathclyde and on individual constituencies is not available. On the national percentage, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) today.

Living Standards

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is able to estimate what percentage of the population of Greenock and Port Glasgow live at or below the supplementary benefit level; and what is his estimate of the national percentage living at or below supplementary benefit level.

Mr. Major: I regret that information on the percentage of people living at or below the supplementary benefit level in individual constituencies is not available. In 1981 just over 14 per cent. of the population of Great Britain lived in families where the head was either receiving supplementary benefit or where the income of the family was below the supplementary benefit level.

Reciprocal Social Security Agreements

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to seek to negotiate a reciprocal social security agreement with Canada; and if he will list in the Official Report the countries with which the United Kingdom has reciprocal social security agreements.

Mr. Major: There is already a social security convention between the United Kingdom and Canada, but it is limited in scope and does not include pensions.

The United Kingdom has reciprocal social security conventions with the following countries:

Austria	Italy
Australia	Jamaica
Belgium	Jersey
Bermuda	Luxembourg
Canada	Malta
Cyprus	Mauritius
Denmark	Netherlands
Finland	New Zealand
France	Norway
Federal Republic of Germany	Portugal
	Spain
Gibraltar	Sweden
Guernsey	Switzerland
Iceland	Turkey
Ireland	United States of America
Isle of Man	Yugoslavia
Israel

Prescriptions (Practice)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the implementation of good prescribing practice as defined by the Medicines Commission, whereby prescribers ought invariably to endorse prescriptions on withdrawn drugs to the effect that the prescription had been issued deliberately and in full knowledge.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have no information on the endorsement of prescriptions for withdrawn drugs. The purpose of the endorsement "WD", that is, "withdrawn drug", is to indicate to the pharmacist that the prescription has been written in full knowledge of the drug's status. If any prescription is not so endorsed pharmacists are advised to confirm the doctor's intentions before dispensing the prescription.

Drugs (Safety)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report those drugs that have been withdrawn during the last five years for safety reasons that have been subsequently prescribed by general medical practitioners.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available. However, a special exercise carried out in the period January to March 1984 in respect of four withdrawn drugs indicated that 100 prescriptions out of a total of 80 million were for these drugs. I am not aware that the level of prescribing of withdrawn drugs gives any cause for concern.

Bed and Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what survey his Department is making of the number of bed and breakfast establishments in each of the district councils in the county of Hampshire.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Disablement Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many have qualified for the severe disablement benefit under (a) the transitional provisions and (b) passport conditions;

(2) how many qualified for the severe disablement benefit under an 80 per cent. assessment test.

Mr. Newton: The latest information available indicates that some 252,000 people have qualified for severe disablement allowance under the transitional provisions for those formerly entitled to a non-contributory invalidity pension, and that, as at 11 March 1986, a further 5,700 people have qualified by satisfying the 80 per cent. disablement condition for the allowance.

Member's Question

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, further to his answer of 19 May, Official Report, column 63, when he expects to reply to the question from the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on additional staff for special claims sections.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 5 June 1986.

General Managers

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent general managers have been appointed in regions, districts and units of the National Health Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The process is very nearly complete. Regional and district appointments were completed some time ago, although there are currently three vacancies at district level. I understand that 539 appointments out of an estimated total of 605 appointments have been made at unit level.

Retirement Age (Women)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice has been given to and by the regional health authorities and district health authorities in the light of the judgment in the Marshall case on the retirement age for women; and what action has been taken to implement this judgment in relation to the National Health Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: There is no national agreement on retirement age in the National Health Service and responsibility for retirement policies rests with individual district health authorities. Following the judgment in the Marshall case, these authorities were advised that they should cease to operate policies which forced a female employee to retire at an age earlier than a male counterpart.

Mr. Victor Paige

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) on what terms Mr. Victor Paige was appointed as chairman of the National Health Service board of management;

(2) how much Mr. Victor Paige has been paid in respect of the current financial year;

(3) if Mr. Victor Paige's present termination of his contract was subject to any penalty clause; and if he will make a statement;

(4) on what terms Mr. Victor Paige terminated his contract as chairman of the National Health Service board of management;

(5) what assistance Mr. Victor Paige obtained from public funds with his private health insurance and his pension arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

NHS Staff (Pay)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the percentage increase in pay and the cash increase at current prices, for nurses, doctors, and ancillary workers each year since 1970; and what, for each of these years, was the percentage increase in (i) the retail prices index and (ii) in national average earnings.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

West Middlesex Hospital

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the dates for the stages in the procedure for the forthcoming appointment of a permanent consultant in the casualty department of the West Middlesex hospital; if he will ask the North West Thames regional health authority to hasten the appointment and if he will review the possibility of an appointment of a senior registrar; if he will make a statement on the establishment, the actual staffing recently and expected in the near future; and what action is being taken to provide emergency services.

Mr. Hayhoe: Strenuous efforts are being made to fill the vacancies in this accident and emergency department and I understand that the chairman of the Hounslow and Spelthorne health authority is keeping my hon. Friend informed about the detailed action being taken.

Pollution (Health Risks)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide estimates to show, for each major cause of airborne pollution, the relative health risks posed for the population at large.

Mr. Whitney: I am advised that the major air pollutants of concern to public health were smoke and sulphur dioxide from domestic and industrial combustion of coal and fuel oil. These used to be responsible for some acute and chronic lung disease. The implementation of the Clean Air Act 1956 has led to a substantial reduction in the concentration of these pollutants and the United Kingdom conforms with the more recent European Community directive that sets limit values designed to avoid risks to health. Studies undertaken to monitor the effectiveness of this action have found no evidence of adverse effects from current exposures.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will instruct his officers to inform all claimants with long-standing disabilities that they may be eligible for the long term rate of supplementary benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mortgage Assistance

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider introducing legislation requiring mortgage assistance for those on supplementary benefit to be paid direct to the lender rather than the borrower; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Re-establishment Centres

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what alternate provision has been made for those people attending re-establishment centres which are being closed;

(2) whether he will keep his Department's re-establishent centres open until such time as alternate provision has been made for those attending such centres;

(3) whether the recommendations of the second report of the Social Services Committee were taken into account when he decided to close the re-establishment centres; and whether the skilled staff will be transferred to the Manpower Services Commission to continue their work.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 22 May at columns 317 to 319.

Nursing and Residential Homes

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to seek to amend the legislation which lays down standards of conduct and protection required by those operating private nursing and residential homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 3 June.

South London Hospital for Women

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will direct South West Thames regional health authority to stop sale proceedings in respect of the site of the South London hospital for women, pending an inquiry into the conformity of that sale with National Health Service guidelines on consideration of the development needs of other health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: As the South West Thames regional health authority has followed the Department's guidance on the sale of surplus property, it would not be appropriate to stop sale proceedings.

Dental Treatment

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is taking to implement the recommendations in the report of the committee of inquiry into unnecessary dental treatment concerning orthodontic treatment.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have set up a committee under the chairmanship of Professor James Moss with the following terms of reference:

"In the light of present knowledge from research, and experience of the use of indices of occlusion, to make recommendations by the end of the year on the development of an index of occlusion for use by the Dental Estimates Board."

The Members of the committee will be:

Professor James P. Moss PhD, BDS, FDS, DOrth, RCS (Chairman);
Professor W. C. Shaw BDS, MScD, PhD, FDS, DOrth DDO;
H. G. Lewis Esq FDS, DOrth RCS;
David Watson James Esq BDS, LDS;
J. C. Bailey Esq LDS, DOrth, RCS.

Food Imports (Safety)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements have been made following the lifting on 31 May of the European Community ban on food imports from certain eastern European countries to ensure the safety of food imported into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: European Council Regulation No. 1707/86 provides that from 31 May in order to protect public health the maximum cumulative levels of caesium 134 and 137 in certain foods imported into the Community from third countries should not exceed 370 becquerels per kilogram for milk and for foodstuffs intended for infants up to the age of six months and 600 bequerels per kilogram for all other foods. The regulation expires on 30 September 1986. Procedures under the regulation allow for the issue in countries of origin, as part of the monitoring arrangements, of certificates to accompany consignments of foodstuffs confirming that the health standards required by the regulation are met.

Port health authorities in the United Kingdom have been informed of the new arrangements. We have informed the Governments of Austria, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Soviet Union, Sweden and Yugoslavia that exports to this country of fresh, frozen and processed fruit and vegetables and dairy products should be accompanied by a certificate. For meat and meat products, compliance with the agreed levels is being made a condition of the health marks required under existing Community legislation. Certified consignments of these foodstuffs will continue to be monitored by port health authorities in accordance with normal practice by use of their existing powers under the Imported Food Regulations 1984.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the National Health Service hospitals which had accident and emergency departments in 1978; and if he will list the hospitals with accident and emergency departments in 1984.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 12 May, c. 384]: I regret that the information requested for 1978 cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate cost. Lists giving the information requested for 1984 have been placed in the Library.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many statutory single payments were made to pensioners in Scotland under the supplementary benefit rules in each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 22 May 1986, c. 315]: The information requested is as follows:

Year (May to April)	Number of single payments awards to pensioners in Scotland
1981-82	47,110
1982-83	36,426
1983-84	42,982
1984-85	79,109
1985-86	*110,615

District Health Authorities

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a list of district health authorities which are conterminous with the local authority dealing with services for senior citizens, environmental health, mental illness and provisions for the disabled.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 15 May 1986, c. 532]: The following district health authorities are conterminous with the local authorities indicated. Local authority services for mental illness and for disabled people, and most services for senior citizens, are provided by social services departments which are the responsibility of county councils, metropolitan district councils and London borough councils. District councils and London boroughs provide environmental health services and assistance with the housing of disabled people. WALES

Welsh Development Agency Factories

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present employment level in Welsh Development Agency factories; and how it compares with the figures for 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 31 December 1985 employment in Welsh Development Agency factories and estates totalled 43,887. This is the latest available figure. At 31 December 1979 the number was 58,100.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many registrations his Department has made under the Data Protection Act; how many people are involved with implementing the legislation in his Department as a significant part of their job description; and how much he estimates it will cost to conform with the eight data protection principles.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: My Department has submitted 35 applications for registration under the Data Protection Act. Three officials have specific responsibilities under the Act which will occupy a significant portion of their time. No reliable estimate of the cost of conforming with the data protection principles can be made until administrative procedures for response to subject access requests have been finalised.

Perinatal Mortality Rates

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the perinatal mortality rates for 1984 for babies weighing (a) under 1,500 g, (b) 1,500 to 2,499 g (c) 2,500 plus g and (d) babies with unstated birthweight in Wales and each health authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is given in the following table. At the district health authority level some of the perinatal mortality rates are based on very small numbers of perinatal deaths and quite large differences are to be expected by chance variation.

Perinatal mortality rates, 1984*

Birthweight Statistics

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total number of births in 1984 of babies weighing (a) under 1,500 g, (b) 1,500 to 1,999 g, (c) 2,000 to 2,499 g, (d) 2,500 to 2,999 g, (e) 3,000 to 3,499 g, (f) 3,500 to 3,999 g, (g) 4,000 plus g and (h) babies with unstated birthweight for Wales and each health authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the following table:

Public Sector Housing Starts

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many public sector housing starts are planned for 1986-87 in Wales; what was the comparable figure for 1980-81; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The figures for planned public sector housing starts are not available as estimates are not held centrally.

Bus Deregulation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been spent by the Transport and Road

Research Laboratory on investigating the impact of bus deregulation in Wales; how much is budgeted for future spending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory is investigating the impact of bus deregulation throughout Great Britain. In Wales two area studies are being undertaken; one is West Glamorgan and one in the districts of Colwyn, Rhuddlan, Glyndwr and Montgomery. These two studies are being funded jointly by the Welsh Office and the Department of Transport. The total cost, including that of any associated surveys, is expected to be of the order of £120,000 in the two years up to December 1987. Expenditure to date has been £6,700.

Hospital Construction and Design

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he plans to take to avoid or reduce errors in the design or construction of Welsh hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: We constantly have under review the effective management and control of health building schemes to avoid and reduce the incidence of errors in design and construction. The code of practice covering all aspects of building and engineering contracts has been revised and expanded. The procedural guidance for progressing health building schemes throughout all stages from inception to completion has been strengthened and improved.

Hospital, Nursing and Ancillary Geriatric Services

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to increase resources for hospital, nursing and ancillary geriatric services in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The revenue provision this year for hospital and community health services in Wales has been increased by £47 million or an increase of 7·6 per cent. by comparison with last year. The level of funds to be made available in future years will be decided within this year's public expenditure survey.

Secondary Schools (Closures)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many secondary schools subject to a section 12 order have been kept open as the result of an appeal to the Secretary of State by parents or governors in each of the last seven years in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales rejected section 12 proposals involving the proposed closure of two secondary schools in 1983, and three secondary schools in 1984. In making such decisions, he takes into account not only statutory objections but all relevant information available.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has now received in total against the proposed introduction of the general certificate of secondary education; and how many of these are from (a) local education authorities, (b) examination boards or groups, (c) independent or private schools, (d) state schools and (e) right hon. and hon. Members and other individuals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given on 9 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower).

Youth Service

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on expenditure (a) in the last year for which figures are available and (b) in 1982-83 on training of part-time youth leaders in Wales; if he plans to increase funds available to the youth service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information about expenditure on the training of part-time youth leaders is not collected centrally. Funding of the statutory youth service is a matter for the local authorities which are responsible for providing a service in their own areas. Welsh Office funding for the voluntary youth service is expected to be maintained at its present level.

Select Committee Report

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the estimated costs to his Department of carrying out the accepted recommendations of Select Committee reports for the year March 1985 to March 1986.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As far as the Committee on Welsh Affairs is concerned, there are no extra costs to my Department for meeting the accepted recommendations of the Committee's report on coastal sewage pollution in Wales. The necessary administrative actions were either in train or would have been put in train as part of the Welsh Office's oversight of water and sewage matters. The Welsh water authority has identified the work needed to improve the quality of bathing waters around the Welsh coast. This has been estimated to cost some £200 million, and the authority plans to complete it over the next 15 years.

PRIME MINISTER

Oil-related Activity

Q32. Mr. Kennedy asked the Prime Minister if, in view of the effect of lower oil prices on North sea developments, she has plans to introduce any alterations to the fiscal regime governing oil-related activity; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am not convinced that the effect of lower oil prices on North sea developments requires any easing of the fiscal regime governing oil-related activity. We shall, however, continue to keep the position under review.

Chernobyl Incident

Q104. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the advice and material assistance given by Britain to the Soviet Union since the start of the Chernobyl incident.

The Prime Minister: As we have already told the House, Her Majesty's Government have offered whatever help and assistance they can provide to the Soviet Union following the Chernobyl accident. The answer given on the 9 May by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), at column 269, sets out details of the equipment which has been provided to the USSR by the United Kingdom.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Hunter asked the Prime Minister what further measures she proposes to take to seek to increase output from manufacturing industry.

The Prime Minister: We shall continue to pursue vigorously policies which encourage sustained economic growth, falling inflation, and competitive enterprise. That is the best way to increased output both in manufacturing and in industry generally, as the experience of the past five years has shown.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 10 June.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

European Council of Ministers

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the progress made in implementing the Council agreement of December 1984; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Budgetary questions will be on the agenda of the 25-26 June European Council.

Quangos

Mr. Kaufman asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 23 May to the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) on quangos, Official Report, column 351, if she will state, out of the 756 quangos which she listed as having been abolished, rationalised or substantially reduced, how many of those which had been reduced are still in existence; what form the rationalisation took in the relevant cases; of those which were rationalised how many are still in existence; how many of the 756 were completely abolished; and how many of the 756 still exist.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 9 June 1986, c. 42]: Four hundred and seven non-departmental public bodies have been completely abolished since 1979. In addition there has been a reduction of 194 in the number of NDPB's which form part of composite organisations such as the wages councils or area manpower boards. But in these cases the composite organisations themselves have not been abolished. A further 155 NDPB's have been rationalised, including five which have been subsequently abolished. The main forms of rationalisation have been:

(i) merging of two or more NDPB's;
(ii) abolition of an NDPB and its replacement by a new body;
(iii) absorption of an NDPB by its sponsor department or another NDPB;
(iv) transfer to the private sector.

SCOTLAND

Redundancies

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each of the last six years the number of redundancies notified to his Department, the total number of jobs involved and the number of company closures.

Mr. Rifkind: There are no comprehensive statistics on redundancies. The table shows information on the number of redundancies and closures affecting 10 or more workers notified to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in Scotland during the period January 1980 and December 1985.

Confirmed redundancies and closures in Scotland from January 1980 to December 1985

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many redundancies have occurred in each of the following categories in Scotland in each year since 1979 (a) manufacturing and (b) construction; and what has been the percentage total decline in employment in each category.

Mr. Rifkind: There are no comprehensive statistics on redundancies. The table shows the number of redundancies affecting 10 or more workers notified to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in Scotland in the manufacturing and construction industries during the period January 1979 to December 1985. The percentage decline in manufacturing employment between 1979 and 1985 was 28 per cent.; and the corresponding decline in construction industry employment was 26 per cent.

Shipbuilding Closures

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce details of special financial and employment assistance for areas in Scotland hit by the recently announced shipbuilding closures comparable to the measures announced for the north-east of England by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The main element of the Government's measures in response to British Shipbuilders' decision to reduce its shipbuilding capacity will be the creation of British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd., with support of up to £5 million in the current financial year. BSEL will operate in all the areas affected by job losses in British Shipbuilders, including Scotland, and will provide expert and practical services for former shipyard workers. An appropriate proportion of the additional £1 million for training made available by the Manpower Services Commission will also be deployed in Scotland, according to the needs of the workers to be made redundant, over and above the training and employment services normally made available by the MSC during redundancies.

The other Government assistance announced for the north-east of England by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, notably measures for derelict land reclamation and measures under the urban programme, are matters dealt with in Scotland principally by the Scottish Development Agency, and I am currently considering with the agency what measures might be taken in addition to its present activities in the affected areas. It is important to keep in mind that these areas already benefit from substantial Government assistance towards measures for job creation and physical and economic regeneration, including European regional development fund aid for shipbuilding closure areas.

Closures and Redundancies

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the largest 25 closures or redundancies in Scotland since 1979, giving date, company name and total jobs lost in each instance.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested cannot be provided since details of redundancies confirmed by individual companies are provided to the Manpower Services Commission in confidence.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Scottish Development Department's Scottish housing statistics for 1985 will be published.

Mr. Rifkind: Publication of "Scottish Housing Statistics, 1985" is expected before the end of July. It is also planned, later this month, to publish a statistical bulletin relating to the fourth quarter of 1985. This bulletin will contain a selection of key annual figures.

Road Construction Contracts

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the 10 contractors who have received the largest share of motorway and trunk road construction contracts in the past three years, giving for each contractor the total value of contracts received.

Mr. Ancram: During the three years ended 31 May 1986, 84 contracts each costing over £100,000 were awarded to 42 contractors. The 10 contractors who received the largest total shares of these contracts were as follows:

	£ million
1. Balfour Beatty Ltd.	22·6
2. Tractor Shovels (Contracts) Ltd.	19·9
3. Shanks & McEwan Ltd.	15·5
4. Whatlings (Civil Engineering) Ltd.	13·6
5. Norwest Holst Ltd.	12·4
6. Tarmac Construction Ltd.	11·2
7. Fairclough Scotland Ltd.	8·8
8. Morrison Construction Ltd.	7·8
9. A. Monk & Co. plc	6·6
10. W. J. Barr and Sons (Scotland) Ltd.	5·3

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the road construction contracts which his Department intends to award in 1986-87, showing in each case the total value of the contract and the expenditure likely to be incurred in that year.

Mr. Ancram: Contracts for the following major schemes, each estimated to cost over £1 million, are expected to be let in 1986-87:

		Estimated Total Cost £ million
A75	Annan Bypass	15·29
A75	Castle Douglas Bypass	3·88
A75	Ringford Bypass	1·58
A82	Auchendennan to Arden (Loch Lomond)	1·50
A830	Kinsadel to Mallaig, Stage I	2·94
A9	Mound Bridges	1·90
A92	Murcar to Balmedie	5·90
A929	Kingsway to Powrie	3·50
A96	Auldearn Bypass	2·30
A96	Bucksburn to Tyrebagger, Stage I	3·30
A96	Forres Bypass	3·39

Start dates during the year, and hence likely expenditure in the year, are dependent on the completion of statutory procedures and monitoring of expenditure on schemes in progress. Depending on these factors, it might prove possible to bring some additional schemes into the programme for 1986-87.

Birthweight Statistics

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total number of births in 1984 of babies weighing (a) under 1,500 gs, (b) 1,500 to 1,999 gs, (c) 2,000 to 2,499 gs, (d) 2,500 to 2,999 gs, (e) 3,000 to 3,499 gs, (f) 3,500 to 3,999 gs, (g) 4,000 gs plus and (h) babies with unstated birthweight for Scotland and each health board.

Select Committee Report

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated costs to his Department of carrying out the accepted recommendations of Select Committee reports for the year March 1985 to March 1986.

Mr. Rifkind: There are no costs involved for either the Scottish Office or the Highland and Islands development Board in implementing the accepted recommendations of the Scottish Affairs committee report on the HIDB other than the administrative costs of assessing the recommendations, and these are not readily quantifiable. Those recommendations of the Scottish Affairs Committee report on fisheries protection accepted by the Government called for changes in emphasis rather than new developments and therefore the associated costs are likely to be very small.

It is not possible to quantify the costs involved in assessing and, where appropriate, implementing the recommendations of other Select Committee reports in so far as they have a bearing on my responsibilities.

National Clean-up Scheme

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the Scottish organisations consulted before Mr. Richard Branson was invited to supervise the national clean-up scheme; what resources he will make available to

Investment (Return)

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he measures the rate of return on investments in different parts of the country.

Mr. MacGregor: With regard to public sector infrastructure, the Government look for the same rate of return on investment in all parts of the country. For investments that are considered under regional policy, grants are made only to investments in assisted areas and local factors may be taken into account in individual decisions, but the same criteria for efficiency are applied to all projects.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many late registrations for value added tax were recorded in the period 1 January to 31 May 1986; how many in the corresponding period of 1985; how many have incurred a penalty; in how many cases the penalty has been waived because of a reasonable excuse; whether any reasonable excuse other than serious illness has been accepted by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; what was the aggregate tax outstanding in the penalty cases; and what was the aggregate penalty exacted.

Mr. Brooke: I regret that, since registration for VAT is dealt with at local VAT offices, some of the information requested, by my hon. Friend is not held centrally. Customs and Excise estimates that before the new penalty system was introduced belated notifications were in the range of 10,000 to 12,000 a year. Since the introduction of penalties under section 15 of the Finance Act 1985, some 3,200 penalties have been imposed. The aggregated value of the penalties imposed to 31 May 1986 is £1,645,000, and the aggregated tax outstanding about £5 million. A plea of reasonable excuse has been accepted by Customs and Excise in about 150 cases where registration was late. A substantial proportion of such cases have involved serious illness and the like, but a number of other excuses have also been accepted as reasonable on the particular facts concerned.

War Service Credits

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the dates from which war service credits were made payable to pensioners of the Home Civil Service, local government, police, local education authorities and other public services, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: Provision for civil servants to reckon war service for pension purposes was made in the Superannuation Act 1946. The arrangements apply to those who entered service before 1 July 1950. Similar arrangements have been introduced by other public services for those who were in employment or retirement on the following operative dates.

	Operative date
Local Government	1 April 1978
Police	1 April 1975
Fire	1 April 1975
Teaching — England and Wales	1 September 1974
— Scotland	20 July 1975
NHS	17 July 1975

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the basis of calculation for the addition of war service credits to the pensions of home civil servants, local government officers, police officers, teachers and other public service pensioners, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: The general basis for the public services is that war service rendered from age 18 reckons at half its length for pension purposes for those who entered service before 1 July 1950. Beneficiaries are required to pay appropriate contributions.

Single European Act

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to implement their obligations in the harmonising of economic and monetary policies in the Single European Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend will continue, in concert with other member states, to maintain sound financial conditions and downward pressure on inflation.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to implement their obligations on the harmonising of indirect taxation in the Single European Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 12 May 1986 at column 348.

European Monetary System

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement outlining the advantages and disadvantages which would accrue to the United Kingdom and the effect of the freedom to conduct economic policy in the United Kingdom in the event of a decision to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement in the dabate on 29 January, at columns 984-1006.

Tax Refunds

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the cost of the refunds due to the miscalculation of tax relief given on any lump sum exceeding £50,000 paid since 6 April 1982; how many individuals are involved; and what is the average refund due.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 76]: It is not known centrally how many people may be entitled to a refund, or what the average refund due will be, but only lump sums over £50,000 are affected and there are thought to be relatively very few of these.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to seek to amend the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 in the light of the House of Lords ruling in the case of Puhlhofer v Hillingdon borough council.

Sir George Young: I have no such plans at present. The key question is what effect, if any, the ruling could have on the way in which local authorities carry out their responsibilities. We shall be monitoring the position through our regular quarterly statistics and through a research study which is just starting on the operation of the legislation by local authorities.

Housing (Hull)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now reply to Hull city council's bid for 1986-87 urban housing renewal unit target funds for a, Yorkshire Development Group, Maisonettes and Bransholme Court Estate; b, Newtown Project and c, Vertical Shelter Housing Scheme, Kinthorpe Orchard Park Estate.

Sir George Young: Hull city council's application for the Bransholme estate has raised some difficult issues which are still under consideration. I expect shortly to be able to announce the decision on its bid for Newtown court estate. With regard to the Orchard park estate, I refer the hon. Member to the announcement made in my reply of 26 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Brandreth), at columns 500-501, which indicated the extent to which the proposals on the estate have qualified for targeted UHRU funds.

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those measures introduced by his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Ridley: My Department has introduced a number of measures, many of which are part of the deregulation initiative described in Cmnds. 9571 and 9794. In particular we have:

Set up and funded two pilot "one stop shops" in partnership with Nottingham City and Blackburn district councils, providing a single advice point within each local authority, to help small firm inquiries;

Provided that specific planning permission is no longer needed for certain extensions to industrial and warehouse buildings except in environmentally sensitive areas;

Published "A Step by Step Guide to Planning Permission for Small Businesses";

Published circular 2/86 "Development by Small Businesses" urging local planning authorities to be helpful in dealing with small firms' planning applications and adopt a commonsense approach to enforcement;

Included measures in the Housing and Planning Bill to extend the assured tenancy scheme to improved, repaired and converted dwellings; to simplify the planning system; and to improve procedures for planning applications and appeals;

Introduced simpler and more flexible building regulations covering England and Wales including inner London;

Given increased funding to the Development Commission to enable it to expand its factory workshop and redundant building grants programmes and the advisory and assistance services operated by its agency, the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas.

Local Authority Services

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the advice and circulars issued by his Department to local authorities since 1979 concerning standards of refuse collection, disposal and street cleansing; and if he will place copies in the Library.

Mr. Ridley: A list of the advice and circulars is as follows:

Waste Management Papers

No. 8 Heat Treatment Cyanide Wastes (Second Edition) 1988
No. 16 Wood Preserving Wastes 1980
No. 18 Asbestos Waste 1979
No. 20 Arsenic bearing Wastes 1980
No. 21 Pesticide Wastes 1980
No. 23 Special Wastes 1984
No. 24 Cadmium bearing Wastes 1984
No. 25 Clinical Wastes 1983

Local Authorities Circulars

20/83 Hazardous Waste Inspectorate (Formation of)

Others

The Hazardous Waste Inspectorate — First Report
Hazardous Waste Management
An Overview 1988

Arrangements are being made for copies to be placed in the Library.

Dr. John Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, and publish an analysis of, the responses received by his Department to the consultation paper "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services" issued on 14 February 1985.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment under what circumstances a fine was incurred by his Department in South Audley Street in 1985.

Sir George Young: The fine was in respect of a Government car service car collecting a Minister from a lunchtime engagement in the area. I should add that the fine was wrongly attributed to the Department of the Environment in the answer I gave the hon. Gentleman on 4 June at columns 570-71. It was incurred by the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total number of parking fines incurred by each Government Department in each year from 1973 to 1984.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the six parking fines incurred by non-ministerial vehicles during 1985.

Sir George Young: Four parking penalties were incurred by vehicles on GCS despatch duties and two were incurred by vehicles carrying officials.

Melton Borough Council

Mr. Lathan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to announce his decision on the Melton Borough Council (Burton Street) Compulsory Purchase Order 1984, following the public inquiry in January.

Sir George Young: The report of the inspector who carried out the public inquiry is being considered and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will issue his decision as quickly as possible.

Hampstead Heath

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position regarding the future of Hampstead Heath.

Sir George Young: The London residuary body is preparing a consultation paper on the options for future ownership and management of the heath. It will be sent to interested parties for comment.

Seaside and Countryside Homes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position regarding the future of the Greater London council's seaside and countryside homes.

Sir George Young: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Associations

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what restrictions have been imposed on the operation of the scheme operated by housing associations with the approval of the Housing Corporation whereby eligible tenants can buy suitable privately owned property on the open market with the aid of a discount, and why; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: As present, only those eligible tenants whose applications were received before 23 August 1985 are being given approval to look for a property to buy. This is because of the popularity of the scheme and because, unlike the right-to-buy discounts, those available to tenants of charitable housing associations impose a direct cost on public funds which has to be accommodated within the Housing Corporation's cash limited approved development programme. Further funds have now been made available for the current financial year and we are reviewing with the Housing Corporation the possibility, of lifting restrictions on the later applicants who have been placed on a waiting list.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what guidance he is giving to the London residuary body in respect of transfers from the Greater London council mortgage account to private sector companies;

(2) if he will itemise the subjects covered by instructions, directives and guidance issued by his Department to each residuary body since abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils;

(3) if he will give his current estimate of the number of ex-Greater London council staff who have still not received full payment of outstanding moneys from the London residuary body;

(4) if he has given any guidance to the London residuary body in respect of the disposal or future use of County Hall;

(5) pursuant to his reply of 27 March, Official Report, column 621, if it is his intention that the transfer of Greater London council seaside and country homes to a housing association will be made without charge.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an indicative figure of meetings between (a) officials and (b) Ministers with the London residuary body since abolition of the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: Since 1 April last, there have been three formal meetings between Ministers of this Department and members of the London residuary body; and about 20 meetings between officials of the Department and those of the London residuary body.

Water Authorities

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, and publish an analysis of, the responses received to date by his Department to the White Paper "Privatisation of the Water Authorities in England and Wales".

Mr. Ridley: My Department has received 280 letters from organisations and others, following publication of the White Paper. It is for the originators of those letters to publish their views, if they so wish. Many were seeking information.

Widdicombe Report

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now announce the date for publication of the Widdicombe inquiry report on local government.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

County Hall

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive proposals for the future use of County Hall; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Decisions on the future use of County hall are for the London residuary body, which is awaiting a consultants' report on its market possibilities.

Hostels

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how many families with dependent children are currently living in hostels which have been declared unfit by environmental health officers.

Sir George Young: I regret that no information is kept centrally from which a reliable estimate could be made.

Rate Support

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the amount of Government support per ratepayer in 1986-87 in Derbyshire; and if he will give equivalent figures for Surrey, Wiltshire, Bedfordshire, Leicestershire and Gloucestershire.

Sir George Young: The information is as follows:

Aggregate Exchequer Grant per Domestic Ratepayer in 1986-87

Derbyshire	512
Surrey	208
Wiltshire	619
Bedfordshire	425
Leicestershire	653
Gloucestershire	574

1. The figures include grants paid to the county council and the district councils.
2 Aggregate Exchequer Grant consists of Block Grant (the Department's initial estimates of entitlements prior to the first Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report), Domestic Rate Relief Grant and Transport Supplementary Grant as given in the Rate Support Grant Settlement Report, and specific grants as reported by authorities in their 1986-87 budget returns.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amount of Government support per ratepayer was given in 1985-86 in Derbyshire; and if he will compare that figure with the years since 1978.

Sir George Young: The information for Derbyshire is as follows:

Aggregate Exchequer Grant Per Domestic Ratepayer

1981-82	597
1982-83	597
1983-84	616
1984-85	675
1985-86	561

Notes

1. Information for years prior to 1981-82 is not readily available.
2. The figures include grants paid to the county council and the district councils.
3. Aggregate Exchequer Grant consists of Block Grant, Domestic Rate Relief Grant and Transport Supplementary Grant as given in the latest Rate Support Grant Reports and specific grants as reported by authorities on returns to the Department.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff in his Department are currently engaged on planning work associated with London.

Sir George Young: There are 32 staff in the Greater London regional office currently engaged wholly or partly on planning work.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 13 June 1986

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Photocopying (Costs)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Lord Privy Seal if the Services Committee will investigate the financial and practical implications of reducing the cost of photocopying, as set out in his answer of 9 June, Official Report, column 9, by wider use in the House of carbon paper.

Mr. Biffen: The Services Committee has in the past taken steps to encourage the increased use of carbon paper by Members' private secretaries. Modern office equipment is not always well adapted to the use of such paper, but I will draw my hon. Friend's suggestion to the attention of the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee, which keeps such matters under continuing review.

PRIME MINISTER

Anti-ballistic Missile Treaty

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list the evidence she has received with regard to Soviet non-compliance with the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

The Prime Minister: I said in the House on 3 June that we regard it as important that the SALT 2 agreement continues to be observed by both sides. The same is true of the anti-ballistic missile treaty and other arms control agreements. We have made it clear that the Soviet Union has a case to answer on compliance issues with regard to the ABM treaty, particularly the Krasnoyarsk radar. We have repeatedly urged them to respond to legitimate United States concerns in appropriate ways, including through the machinery of the Standing Consultative Commission.

SALT 2

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list the evidence she has received with regard to Soviet non-compliance with the SALT 2 treaty.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) on 11 June.

Dr. Usamah Al-Baz (Meeting)

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on her meeting with Dr. Usamah Al-Baz, Director of President Mubarak's Office for Political Affairs, on 6 June; and what message he conveyed to her from the President of Egypt.

The Prime Minister: We had a useful exchange of views on current developments in the middle east. Dr. Al-Baz conveyed President Mubarak's views on the need for renewed efforts to achieve a just and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute.

Quangos

Mr. Kaufman asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 23 May to the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) Official Report, column 351, if she will explain the basis on which she gave the figure for the net reduction in the number of quangos since 1979 as 514, in the light of her statement in that answer that during the relevant period 242 new bodies have been created and of her statement in the answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, of 10 June that the number of bodies abolished was 407; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Between 1979 and 1985 the gross reduction in the number of non-departmental public bodies (NDPB's) was 756. During that same period 242 new bodies were created, resulting in a net reduction of 514. Of the 756 gross reduction, 407 bodies were abolished outright. A further 194 cases involved the abolition of bodies (each an NDPB in itself) which formed part of larger composite organisations, but the composite organisation continued to exist. A further reduction of 155 was achieved by the merger of bodies or some other form of rationalisation as explained in my answer to the right hon. Member's earlier question on 10 June, at column 109.

ENVIRONMENT

Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to visit Liverpool to meet leaders of the city council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have no plans at present to visit Liverpool, to meet the city councillors. I reaffirm my predecessor's statement to the city council that it must balance its budget within the resources available to it.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any changes are proposed to his Department's running costs limit since the limit was announced in the summary and guide to the 1986-87 Supply Estimates (Cmnd. 9742).

Mr. Ridley: Yes. The running costs limit is to be increased by £1·511 million from £136·210 million to £137·721 million. The Department's running costs limit is being increased by £1·652 million to reflect the provision finally agreed for running costs in the Department's Main Estimates. In addition, however, the limit is being reduced by £0·141 million to £137·721 million, reflecting higher estimated VAT receipts (to be included in a revised Estimate for Class X, Vote 4).

Housing Management

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps the Government have taken, following their announcement in 1985 of funding for studentships at the London School of Economics, to encourage the development of new housing management courses.

Sir George Young: When speaking to the annual conference of the Institute of Housing this morning my right hon. Friend was pleased to announce that following negotiations between the Urban Housing Renewal Unit, the Institute of Housing, and Sheffield City polytechnic, a new full-time, two-year postgraduate course in housing management will be launched at Sheffield City polytechnic this autumn. It will meet the necessary professional criteria. My Department will provide funding, through the Economic and Social Research Council for 15 studentships a year for this course, which will, in my view, make a significant contribution to raising standards in public housing management.

The first year will be largely academic in content; most of the second year will be spent working with selected housing authorities and housing associations. The studentships will provide for maintenance and fees in the first year and for fees only in the second year.

I hope to see more courses which are worthy of our support come forward for next year.

Seaside and Countryside Homes

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the current position regarding the future of the Greater London council's seaside and countryside homes;

(2) pursuant to his reply of 27 March, column 621, if it is his intention that the transfer of GLC seaside and country homes to a housing association will be made without charge.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986]: Discussions on the terms under which the homes will pass to a housing association are continuing between an association and the London Residuary Body.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total number of parking fines incurred by each Government Department in each year from 1973 to 1984.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986]: A detailed analysis of parking fines for the period 1980 to 1984 cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. As stated in my reply of 11 June, at column 183, detailed records for the period 1973 to 1979 are no longer available.

Local Authority Services

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, and publish an analysis of, the responses received by his Department to the consultation paper "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services" issued on 14 February 1985?

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986]: More than 450 responses were received and a list of the main respondents was placed in the Library on 30 October 1985. The responses varied widely, and it would be very difficult to produce a meaningful and representative analysis. Respondents are of course free to make their views public if they wish.

Local Government (Widdicombe Report)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now announce the date for publication of the Widdicombe inquiry report on local government.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986]: I have not yet anything to add to the reply which my right hon. Friend the member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) on 14 May, at column 492.

Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times, and for what purposes, he has used his powers under section 73 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has powers under this section to direct local authorities that part of their annual capital allocation may be used only for specified projects of national or regional importance. He has issued such directions to Bradford city council for the National Museum of Photography; to the corporation of the City of London for the Barbican arts centre; to Derwentside district council for the Consett land reclamation scheme; to Preston borough council for the Preston docks redevelopment; to St. Helens metropolitan borough council for Operation Groundwork; to Southampton city council for the Western Esplanade geothermal energy project; to 52 authorities for coast protection works; and to 14 authorities for sea defence works.

Two former GLC projects, the Thames barrier and the River Brent flood prevention scheme, received similar treatment under the separate arrangements which applied to the GLC.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has also issued directions in respect of certain highways, airports and port projects.

The power also contained in the section to direct that no part of an authority's allocation may be used in respect of a specified project has not been used.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Higher Education (Funding)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received from Edinburgh university about the funding of higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received a letter from the principal of Edinburgh university expressing concern about the level of university funding. The Government have already announced their willingness to consider additional funding for the universities if there is evidence of progress in implementing the policies of selectivity and rationalisation, financial management and improved standards of teaching.

Sex Education

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to the answer of 3 June, Official Report, column 480, if he intends that sex education should now be part of the core curriculum in maintained primary and secondary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government believe that, in the course of their period of compulsory education, all pupils should receive sex education as an essential element in the curriculum. Subject to the enactment of the Education Bill currently before the House, it is, however, for the local education authorities and schools to determine the way in which sex education should be provided for pupils in different age ranges, needs and circumstances. My right hon. Friend has already announced his intention shortly to publish a draft circular giving guidance in this field.

Nursery Teachers

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what information he has about the number of unfilled or partially filled vacancies for nursery teachers in inner London;

(2) if he has any evidence of a shortage of suitably qualified nursery teachers in (a) England and Wales and (b) Inner London; what steps he is taking to remedy the situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The recent report by Her Majesty's inspectorate on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on education provisions in England, 1985, points to evidence of shortages of qualified nursery teachers in some parts of the country. I do not have the figures for unfilled or partially filled vacancies for nursery teachers in the Inner London education authority but understand that this authority may be one of the worst affected.

As for the steps taken by the Government, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer of 14 April, at columns 228-29, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and to my own answer of 10 June, at column 154, to my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle).

For the position in Wales, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Teachers of the Deaf

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received with regard to the future of training for teachers of the deaf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government consulted widely on the 1984 report from the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers (ACSET) about training to teach children with special educational needs, including the deaf. The decision to accept ACSET's recommendations that specialist qualifications should be acquired after a period of mainstream teaching experience, and to pursue the substitution of in-service courses for the existing specialist initial training courses, was announced in the White Paper "Better Schools". Since then my right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on the subject of training to teach the deaf, including several letters from hon. Members. Officials recently met representatives of the British Association for Teachers of the Deaf (BATOD) to discuss this and other issues.

Mr. Jonathan Savery

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet received information from the Avon education authority as to the outcome of the disciplinary hearing concerning Mr. Jonathan Savery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The disciplinary hearing cleared Mr. Savery of the charge of racism. The panel was evenly divided on whether Mr. Savery's actions amounted to such professional misconduct or misjudgment as to warrant formal disciplinary sanctions. Discussions are in progress between the LEA and Mr. Savery on his future deployment. My Department will keep in touch with developments.

Reye's Disease

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research has been supported by his Department into Reye's disease, and what has been the cost.

Mr. Walden: I understand from the Medical Research Council that it is not supporting any research into Reye's syndrome. Research relevant to Reye's syndrome may be conducted in universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee. Details of any such work are not collected centrally.

Educational Provision (HMI Reports)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many reports by Her Majesty's Inspectorate on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on educational provision in England have been made to his Department; and if he will state the date of publication of each report and the educational period covered by the report.

Mr. Chris Patten: There have been nine reports by Her Majesty's Inspectorate on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on education provision in England. Six have been published, as follows:

February 1981
March 1982
July 1983
May 1984
May 1985
May 1986

Each report is based on inspection evidence, and financial and statistical information in relation to individual local authorities, obtained during the previous autumn term.

University Funding

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science why Queen's University, Belfast, was not included among those to which his written reply, Official Report, column 14, 9 June, related.

Mr. Walden: Universities in Northern Ireland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Careers Service

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what sums were expended, nationally and by local education authorities, on the schools careers service in 1979-80, 1984-85 and 1985-86 in actual terms and at 1986 prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I have been asked to reply.
I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 12 June.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Scotch Whisky

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to follow up the Prime Minister's approach to the Prime Minister of Japan at the Tokyo summit pressing for the removal of discriminatory tax and duty rates imposed on Scotch whisky.

Mr. Alan Clark We are continuing to press strongly for the removal of Japanese discrimination in the tax and duty facing Scoth whisky and other imported alcoholic drinks. The European Community is to have further talks with the Japanese shortly, and we continue to take every opportunity to press the case bilaterally.

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, during his recent visit to Korea, the Minister of State received any indication of the Korean Government's timetable for the liberalisation of bottled Scotch whisky.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that I did not, but I urged Korean Ministers to remove the restrictions on imports of bottled Scotch whisky, and I shall continue to press for an early response.

Electronics

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the imports and exports of electronic/electrical products for each year from 1978 to 1984; and if he will give the best estimate for 1985 to date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is as follows:

*United Kingdom in Electronic Electrical Products

	Imports	Exports
1978	3,407	3,887
1979	4,104	4,135
1980	4,408	4,767
1981	5,482	5,010
1982	6,814	5,892
1983	8,824	6,841
1984	11,154	8,717
1985	12,450	10,569

* Classes 33 and 34 of the standard industrial classification (1980).

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will consider the establishment of regional development agencies in England with powers similar to those exercised by the Scottish Development Agency.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986, c. 247]: I have no plans to establish such agencies.

Japanese Vehicles (Import Restrictions)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 9 June, Official Report, column 42, what are the quantitative restrictions against the import of Japanese vehicles which exist in Spain and Portugal which the EEC allowed to continue; and for how long these will be allowed to continue.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986, c. 248]: The levels of these restrictions are set by the Governments of Spain and Portugal, although certain guidlines applicable to Portugal until the end of 1987 are laid out in protocol 23 of the treaty of accession, European Communities No. 27 (1985), a copy of which has been placed in the Library. Article 364 of the treaty requires the Portuguese to retain the restrictions covered by protocol 23 until at least the end of 1987. There are no other time constraints.

HOME DEPARTMENT

London Fire Brigade

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list every fire station within the North East Area Command of the London Fire Brigade, indicating those where, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Fire Services, the station ground is currently obtaining over provision of fire cover by the London Fire Brigade as defined in Home Office Fire Service Circular 4/1985 of 22 May 1985.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The fire stations in the north-east area command are as follows. The London Fire Brigade is presently discussing with Her Majesty's Fire Service Inspectorate the question of a comprehensive review of the standards of fire cover taking account of Fire Service Circular 4/1985. That circular, however, does not on its own provide a benchmark for assessing over-provision of fire cover. This is an issue for the Fire and Civil Defence Authority and the Chief Fire Officer to consider in ensuring the provision of adequate protection by effective, efficient and economic means. Her Majesty's Fire Service Inspectorate is conscious of this when inspecting the brigade.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the 1987-88 provisional expenditure level he proposes to determine for the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority for fire brigade and civil defence purposes; and what is his estimate of the change in the present establishment of fire fighters, fire appliances and fire stations in the London Fire Brigade as at 1 April 1986 that would result from the application of this provisional expenditure level in 1987-88.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce his provisional determination of the expenditure level for the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority for 1987-88 towards the end of July. The expenditure level will reflect his assessment of the establishement required to provide an effective, efficient and economic level of service.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to make the use of the computerised fire cover model mandatory by the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority in determining Greater London's future fire cover; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No.

Prisoners (Costs)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West of 4 June, if he will give the details as to how he reached the average figure of £256 as the average weekly cost of keeping a person in prison in England and Wales during the financial year 1984-85.

Mr. Mellor: The figure of £256 was obtained by putting together information from the prison department costing system about the operating costs of the prison service in the financial year 1984-85 with information about the average inmate population of penal establishments over the same period. A description of the costing system is given in chapter 2 of the report on the work of the prison department 1984-85, a copy of which is in the Library. Table D in appendix 2 to the report shows net operating costs, average inmate population and weekly cost per inmate by penal establishment and region.

Women Prisoners (Brixton)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table detailing on a monthly basis the number of body searches, cell searches and cell changes carried out on each of the three women being held on remand at Her Majesty's prison, Brixton;

(2) how many strip searches were made of the three female prisoners held on remand in Her Majesty's prison, Brixton, during the first five months of 1986, detailing the number of times each person was strip searched per month; whether any contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely, making an appearance at a courthouse on remand, attending trial, inter-prison visits or other reasons.

Mr. Hurd: Strip searching is a routine security procedure, of long standing, to which all prisoners, male and female (including those on remand), are subject. It is essential to detect small items of contraband—such as weapons and drugs — which can easily be concealed about the person and which cannot be detected by other means of searching. Because of the nature and circumstances of the offences with which they were charged, all three women prisoners in Brixton were provisionally placed in the highest security category, category A, which is reserved for those prisoners whose escape would be highly dangerous to the public, or to the police, or the security of the State. In accordance with standard practice, they have been strip searched before and after court appearances, at the time of cell changes, and during wing and cell searches. The information requested is contained in the following tables covering the first five months of 1986:

1986	Ms. Anderson	Ms. O'Dwyer	Mrs. Schulze
Strip searches before and after court appearances
January	nil	nil	nil
February	3	2	nil
March	2	2	nil
April	nil	nil	nil
May	34	34	nil
Strip searches after visits
January	15	17	6
February	22	24	7
March	25	25	6
April	40	37	5
May	26	25	13
Strip searches at time of cell change, wing search or cell search
January	6	7	6
February	5	6	6
March	4	6	6
April	6	6	6
May	2	2	5

For reasons which the hon. Member will understand, it is not the practice to disclose detailed information such as that requested about security arrangements — for example the frequency of cell changes or cell searches.

The trial of Ms. Anderson, Ms. O'Dwyer and their co-defendants opened at the Central Criminal Court on 6 May and they were convicted on 11 June.

There is no record of an occasion on which any of the prisoners has refused to be strip searched and been searched under restraint. To date, no unauthorised item has been found on any of the three women during a strip search. But the justification for strip searching lies not only in the fact that staff do discover items (such as drugs, syringes, plastic knives sharpened into daggers, and scissors) which they would not otherwise find, but also in the deterrent effect which such searching undoubtedly has.

Records are not kept of the occasions when rub-down searching, or "frisking", is carried out in prisons. Such searching is a routine security measure in prison establishments as it is in other circumstances — for example, at airports.

Suicides

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides for each of the last five years have been recorded by the Portsmouth coroner.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is given in the following table:

Verdicts of suicide returned at coroners inquests in the Portsmouth coroners district

	Number
1981	22
1982	22
1983	20
1984	13

Hippy Convoy

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a report from the chief constable of Hampshire setting out a schedule of the summonses and charges brought against members of the so-called hippy convoy whilst they were in Hampshire; and what information he has as to the penalties so far imposed by the courts.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Prison Officers

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers have left the service for each of the last five years excluding those who have taken normal retirement and retirement for medical reasons.

Mr. Mellor: The figures are as follows:

	*Number
1981	207
1982	191
1983	239
1984	227
1985	217

* Night patrols, temporary officers, prison auxilliaries and matrons are not included in the figures.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many new prison officer posts have been created in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The figures show additions to the complement of prison officer class posts, excluding trades officers, since 1 April 1983. Information for earlier years is not readily available.

	Number
1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984	1,057
1 April 1984 to 31 March 1985	668
1 April 1985 to 31 March 1986	889

Prison Disturbances

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of the damage in each of Her Majesty's prisons in the recent disturbances.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

Establishment	Estimated cost £
Ashford	980
Bristol	148,000
Camp Hill	1,000
Cardiff	700
Castington	1,000
Deerbolt	300

Standord Hill	5,000
Wandsworth	500

Prison Psychologists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) psychologists and (b) clinical psychologists are employed by the prison department; which prisons they work in; what are their main functions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Eighty five psychologists are employed by the prison department; eight of these have clinical qualifications. The psychologists' main functions include assessment and counselling work with prisoners, training and advisory work with staff, consultancy services to management, and research.

A majority of prison psychologists have post-graduate qualifications relevant to the wide variety of tasks undertaken. Apart from those who work in headquarters, regional offices and the Prison Service College, psychologists are located in the following 25 establishments, and provide a visiting service in approximately 40 others:

HM Prisons at Acklington, Albany, Birmingham, Bristol, Frankland, Gartree, Grendon, Highpoint, Holloway, Leyhill, Lindholme, Long Lartin, Maidstone, Parkhurst, Pentonville, Wakefield, Wandsworth, Wormwood Scrubs.

HM Young Custody Centres at Aylesbury, Castington, Feltham, Glen Parva, Hindley, Portland, Rochester.

Clinical psychologists are located in Birmingham, Holloway, Leyhill, Maidstone, Parkhurst and Wormwood Scrubs prisons.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many National Health Service clinical psychologists provide consultant services in prisons; which prisons they work in; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Details of the consultancy work provided for the prison medical service are not readily available.

Prison Doctors

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any doctors in the prison medical service are eligible for any distinction or other merit awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The pay and conditions of service or prison medical officers are those of the Medical Civil Service generally. There is no system of merit payments comparable to the distinction awards payable to certain consultants in the National Health Service.

Protected Cells (Cost)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost of construction of a new protected cell in a prison hospital; how many and which prison hospitals now contain such new cells; and what is his policy concerning the contfuction of further such cells.

Mr. Mellor: The standard for protected rooms to accommodate violent or seriosly disturbed patients in prison hospitals has recently been reviewed, and prototype protected rooms equipped to a new standard which includes a padded wall lining material and improved observation, ventilation and heating, have been installed at Birmingham and Holloway prisons by converting existing hospital accommoadtion. In addition, experimental tests of the lining material only have been carried out at Bedford prison. The total cost of the building and engineering work at Birmingham was £15,200 and the estimated cost of the work at Holloway is £12,600. It is not possible at present to say what the cost of a protected room to the higher standard in a new prison hosptial would be, but the cost of the wall lining material (which is included in the costs of the Birmingham and Holloway rooms) is £3,600. If these prototype rooms prove successful in operational use, similarly equipped rooms will be made a standard requirement in all new and refurbished prison hosptials.

Residential Homes (Fires)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the number of fires in homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector which required the services of the fire brigade.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Separate information on fires in homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984 is not available. The total numbers of firs attended by local authority fire brigades in England and Wales in 1984, in categories of premises which would include any such homes are:

	Numbers
Hospitals, including nursing homes	1,890
Residential welfare or charitable homes, including those for children, old people and the handicapped or disabled	968

These figures include premises in both the public and private sectors; public sector premises are not subject to the Registered Homes Act.

THE ARTS

Denning—Sadler Review

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he will require the Arts Council to publish in full the recommendations of the Denning-Sadler review together with an indication of those which have been accepted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce [pursuant to his reply, 11 June 1986, c. 197]: No. The review was undertaken by the Arts Council and decisions on publication rest with it. The Council has already published the decisions that underlie the reorganisation which is currently in progress, and which incorporates a structure more suited to its present requirements.

DEFENCE

Command and Control Systems

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has made any recent representations to his United States counterpart on command and control systems.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has made no such representations.

Home Defence Force

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current overall cost of the Home Defence Force.

Mr. Freeman: The Home Service Force is an integral part of the Territorial Army and, other than personnel costs, that is, those costs which can be attributed to an individual, it is not possible, without disproportionate effort, separately to identify all the costs required to calculate the overall cost.

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost per man, and what has been the cost per man in past years, of the Home Defence Force.

Mr. Freeman: The cost per man of the Home Service Force in training year 1985-86 was £770 for soldiers and £1,095 for officers. The comparable figures for 1984-85, the earliest year in which figures were compiled, were £574 and £863. These figures do not include elements for accommodation and works services which are not readily identifiable from such costs for the Territorial Army: it is not possible therefore to calculate the overall cost per man of the Home Service Force.

Defence Contracts (Offset)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to improve the arrangements made by his Department to enable smaller companies to benefit from offset arrangements on offer to the United Kingdom in the defence procurement field.

Mr. Lee: Our experience in monitoring such arrangements suggests that small companies do benefit from offset work placed in the United Kingdom by overseas prime contractors. While the onus remains upon these prime contractors to identify suitable offset opportunities with British firms, the MOD, primarily through the Defence Export Services Organisation, offers advice to any United Kingdom company interested in bidding for offset work and to overseas contractors, by identifying potential sources of United Kingdom supply.

Pakistan (Frigates)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement about the progress of negotiations for the export of frigates to Pakistan.

Mr. Lee: As the hon. Member will appreciate, this is a complex matter, negotiations are continuing with the Pakistan Government and we are hopeful that they will soon reach a conclusion. Details must at present remain confidential for commercial reasons.

Defence Establishments (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any plans to relocate any defence establishments currently in Portsmouth away from the area.

Mr. Freeman: As the hon. Member will be aware, studies into the use of the naval estate in Portsmouth are continuing, but we do not envisage that these will lead to the movement of any major units outside the Portsmouth area.

Petty Officer John Black

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what were the specific duties of the late Petty Officer John Black during his posting at HMS Rooke, Gibraltar.

Mr. Freeman: The late Petty Officer Black was employed on sonar duties at HMS Rooke which any rating of his branch might be called upon to perform.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what day in April 1982 the late Petty Officer John Black, Royal Navy, reported for duty at HMS Rooke, Gibraltar; and whether he remained there throughout the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Freeman: The late Petty Officer John Black reported for duty at HMS Rooke, Gibraltar on 26 April 1982. He remained at this establishment until he returned to HMS Dolphin in July 1983 for a course.

Schools of Music

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has yet made a decision with regard to the defence schools of music.

Mr. Freeman: No, although the review which my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement announced on 12 February is well under way.

SCOTLAND

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those measures introduced by his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Responsibility for small firms matters in Scotland lies with the Industry Department for Scotland with services also being provided by the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. In addition to providing a number of services specific to Scotland, the Department along with the SDA and HIDB monitors United Kingdom measures introduced by other Departments. The following Scottish measures have been introduced since May 1985 to benefit the small firms sector.

Government Assistance Promoters (GAP) Scheme

Launched in April 1986, the scheme is aimed at making small companies aware of the range of Government assistance available and to help them benefit from that assistance. Like the Better Business Services (BBS) and Better Technical Services (BTS) Schemes, GAP has been introduced using finance from the European Regional Development Fund. Eleven experienced advisory organisations within Strathclyde and Tayside Regions have been appointed, and will be funded, to assist small companies in their area. There will be no charge for services.

Improved Advisory Services

In recognition of the need to improve advisory and information services to small firms, the SDA have introduced 2 new sources of data to their operations. First, the Agency's Small Firms Centres in Glasgow and Edinburgh have installed Strathclyde University's MIDAS (Micro Computer Industrial Development Assistance Scheme) Information Bank which provides detailed information of all schemes of assistance for small firms in Scotland; the data bank allows quick access to material requested by clients and monthly updating ensures that information on schemes of assistance is accurate. Second, the Agency published, in March 1986, a comprehensive guide for business advisors in Scotland: the "Financial Aid Guide" gathers together information on all the common grants, loans and incentives available to Scottish businesses. The Agency's local network of advice and assistance has also been improved by the opening of new small firms centres in Edinburgh and Stirling. Similarly the HIDB's local office network has been expanded with the opening of an office in Oban and four additional small business counsellors have been appointed in the HIDB area. In addition, the HIDB's business activity leaflets for small businesses were rationalised into a comprehensive advice brochure.

Information for small firms on the forms of assistance available from the Industry Department for Scotland was also improved during 1985 with the publication, in September, of a comprehensive Investment, Innovation and Technology and Export Assistance Handbook.

Local Enterprise Trusts

The range of assistance and support for small firms from Local Enterprise Trusts in Scotland continues to develop. Since May 1985 6 new Enterprise Trusts have been established bringing the total number in Scotland to 35. The Trusts are funded through assistance from the private sector, the SDA and local authorities.

Enterprise Funds for Youth (EFFY)

This pilot scheme, which is administered by four Enterprise Trusts and funded jointly by the Trusts and the SDA, completed its first year of operation during 1985. The scheme which provides loans of up £3,000 to new enterprises started by young people between the ages of 16 and 25, is being evaluated to consider its potential for wider application.

Programme for Rural Initiatives and Development (PRIDE)

The SDA introduced PRIDE during 1985 with approval of a first project in June. The scheme provides fixed asset funding as a catalyst to stimulate new small privately-led business initiatives which, like the Agency's DRAW (Development of Rural Area Workshops) scheme for small premises, will counter problems of unemployment and population decline in rural areas. During its first year, PRIDE has funded 16 projects with a total value approaching £6 million. £4·8 million of this funding came from the private sector with just under £1 million being contributed by the Agency.

Deregulation

The Scottish Office is working in tandem with Whitehall Departments in pursuing the deregulation initiative as outlined in the White Papers "Lifting the Burden" and "Building Businesses not Barriers". To date the principle measures taken have been in relation to simplification of planning procedures and building regulations.

Cash Limits

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will announce any increase in his cash limits to take account of the pay settlements following the recommendations of the National Health Service review bodies.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for Class XVI, Vote 14 (Prisons, Hospitals and Community Health Services, etc., Scotland) will be increased by £5,882,000, from £1,598,270,000 to £1,604,152,000. This increase is to enable health services to be maintained and developed as planned following the decision to implement from 1 July 1986 the recommendations of the pay review bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professionals allied to medicine, announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Thursday 22 May 1986. This increase will be charged to the Reserve and therefore does not add to the public expenditure planning total.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Enter and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Peter Brooke: No Inland Revenue officer has power to enter and search premises except with the authority of a warrant issued by a circuit judge. An application may be made only wth the express approval of the Board of Inland Revenue which may not delegate the exercise of this function. the statutory authority under which this power is exercised is section 20C of the Taxes Management Act 1970.

Officers of Customs and Excise who have been issued with commissions have the power to enter and search premises under the statutory authorities are as follows. In most cases the powers require the issue of a warrant by a magistrate. Just over half the staff employed by Customs and Excise have been issued with commissions.

Customs and Excise powers of entry and search

Value Added Tax

Mr. Dover asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was his original estimate of the revenue in 1[illegible]85 and 1985-86 from the imposition of value added tax on takeaway foods; and what was the actual revenue gathered from this source in each year.

Mr. Brooke: When the imposition of value added tax on hot take away food was announced in the 1984 Budget, it was estimated that the net revenue yield would be £125 million in 1984-85 and £200 million in a full year. No estimate was made for 1985-86.

Value added tax paid in respect of hot take away food and drink is not separately identified in Customs and Excise accounts, nor is it possible to produce a reliable estimate from consumers' expenditure data, since the latest survey information relates only to 1984, when expenditure patterns were distorted by the immediate effects of imposing value added tax.

Mr. Dover asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the implications for employment in the takeaway food industry of the imposition of value added tax in the Budget of 1984.

Mr. Brooke: No reliable information is available on employment in the hot take away food industry. In any case, it would not be possible to isolate and evaluate separately the effects of imposing value added tax on hot take away food and drink from those of other changes, such as trends in consumers' tastes, fluctuations in the price of raw materials, and the consequences of competition in the industry.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he has made with his negotiations with the Community on raising value added tax thresholds.

Mr. Brooke: As indicated in the reply to my hon. Friend on 17 April 1986 at column 483, negotiations have been continuing with the Commission with a view to allowing member states greater flexibility in determining their threshold. We are now awaiting the Commission's formal proposals.

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the actual net payment to the European Economic Community in 1985; and what were the comparable figures in 1975 and 1980, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: The latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Economic Community in 1985 is £1,870 million. The special reasons why the figure was so large were explained in my reply of 3 March 1986 to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) at column 69. Our net contribution in 1980 was £706 million, while in 1975 we benefited from net receipts of £56 million. United Kingdom contributions during the period 1975-79 were, of course, reduced by the transitional financial arrangements applying for the first four years after accession.

Pensions (Taxation)

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received seeking the introduction of taxation of pension lump sums or the withdrawal of tax relief on employers' pension contributions.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In recent weeks, none.

Civil List

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had about Civil List expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend gives careful consideration to civil list expenditure each year.

EC (Currency Unit)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 9 June, Official Report, column 76, whether the figures given for the rate of exchange for the ecu to the United States dollar referred to the budget approved by the Council or to that approved by the Assembly; and if he will also give the appropriate figure for whichever of the budgets his original answer did not cover.

Mr. Brooke: To both.

Personal Taxation

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what would be the changes in the yield of income tax, higher rate tax and employee's contributions to national insurance in 1986-87 if the combined rates were consolidated at 40 per cent. of taxable incomes with the tax allowances remaining as at present;

(2) if he will publish a table showing his estimate for the current financial year of the numbers of people who will be liable to pay income tax, higher rate tax and employee's contributions to national insurance, divided into the main categories on the basis of the combined rates of deduction from income for which they will be liable.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the sum, expressed in pounds sterling, which the European Court determined had been granted unlawfully by the European Assembly to certain political parties; and how much of the total was distributed to British political parties.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 22 May 1986, c. 308]: The sum which the European Court determined had been granted unlawfully by the European Parliament to political groups was 43 million ecu (about £27,547,000 at current exchange rates). Details of the distribution within this total to British political parties are not available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for waiting lists for in-patient gynaecological treatment in each health district in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The latest available information, which relates to 31 December 1985, is as follows:

Education Services

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 13 February to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn, (Mr. Best) Official Report, column 599, when he expects to receive the advice of the Wales Advisory Board on local authority higher education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Wales Advisory Body will be considering the future pattern of initial teacher training provision in the public sector at its meeting on 27 June.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many reports on the effects on the education services in Wales of recent local authority expenditure policies have been made by Her Majesty's Inspectorate to his Department; and if he will give the date of publication of each report and the educational year covered by the report.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There have been five such reports and all have been published as follows:

Period covered by report	Date of publication

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the housing capital outturn figures for 1984-85 for each Welsh housing authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is given in the followig table:

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of overall public expenditure in Wales was represented by housing capital expenditure during the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1984-85 (the latest year for which firm figures are available) net housing capital expenditure in Wales (£119 million) represented a little over 4·5 per cent. of overall public expenditure within our responsibility. Because public expenditure is measured net of receipts and other income, no account has been taken in this calculation of that element of housing capital expenditure which was financed by receipts. In 1984-85 this additional expenditure exceeded £98 million.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many house completions were made in Wales in 1985; and how this compares with the figures for 1979-80 and 1982-83.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1985, 8,213 completions were made. This compares with 11,360 and 7,930 completions for 1979-80 and 1982-83, respectively.

Taff Barrage

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to make an announcement about the construction of the Taff river barrage currently being considered by his Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have received the results of the preliminary studies into the feasibility of building a barrage across the Cardiff harbour mouth and of the investment potential in the south Cardiff area. We are now considering them and hope to be able to make an announcement shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Products

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what steps his Ministry takes to ensure that animal products imported into the United Kingdom have not been obtained from animals subjected in their country of origin to treatment classed as cruel in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to ban the importation into the United Kingdom of wool from Australia from sheep which have been subjected to mulesing; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: It is not my Ministry's policy to restrict imports on the grounds suggested by the hon. Member, nor has it powers to do so.

As regards the particular example to which the hon. Member refers, I understand that an Australian Senate Select Committee is currently conducting an inquiry into mulesing.

Land Settlement Association Properties

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current position of former Land Settlement Association properties in Bedfordshire.

Mrs. Fenner: Over 80 per cent. of the smallholdings and houses on the two former Land Settlement Association estates in Bedfordshire at Chawston and Potton have been sold, the majority to sitting tenants. The freeholds of the remaining tenanted smallholdings and houses are being offered to third parties subject to the existing tenancies, except in those cases where the tenants have entered into separate agreements with my Ministry that retain their first option to buy subject to certain conditions. Vacant land not already sold will mostly be sold by the autumn. The former centralised service buildings at Chawston have all been sold.

Radiation

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on the reasons for the distinction between the 1,000 becquerels per kilo emergency reference level for daesium 137, caesium 134 and iodine 131 in sheepmeat in the United Kingdom as against the level of 600 becquerels per kilo in other countries of the European Community.

Mrs. Fenner: Emergency reference levels for sheepmeat in the United Kingdom were agreed by the Government on the advice of the National Radiological Protection Board and were derived from recommendations published by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. The maximum level of 600 Bq kilo of radiocaesium is that agreed by the European Community for imports from third countries. This is more restrictive because it takes into account the uncertain nature of information from some third countries affected by the accident at Chernobyl.

Entry and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Jopling: A little more time is needed to answer this and I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Aspartame

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the source and nature of the data relied upon to approve the use of aspartame in the United Kingdom; what action he proposes to take to protect consumers using this product; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Aspartame is permitted for use in food by the Sweeteners in Food Regulations 1983. It was fully evaluated for safety and need by our expert committees which recommended its use without restriction in all food (other than those manufactured specially for babies and young children where the criterion of need was not thought to be satisfied). A bibliography of the toxicological data considered by the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment together with a summary of the committee's views about aspartame are contained in the Food Additives and Contaminants Committee's report on the review of sweeteners in food published in 1982.

Labels of prepackaged food are required to identify clearly the additives used in the food, and where the artificial sweetener aspartame is used it has to be indicated by name.

Radioactive Discharges

Mr. Hancock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring takes place of radioactive charges in the Channel.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 81]: Monitoring of radioactive discharges into the Channel from United Kingdom nuclear sites is carried out by the site operators in accordance with the discharge authorisations granted under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for the Environment. Duplicate samples are supplied to Her Majesty's Radiochemical Inspectorate and are sent for independent analysis, the results being used by the inspectorate to check the operators' liquid effluent discharge records. Site operators are also required, as a condition of their discharge authorisation, to carry out regular environmental monitoring.

An independent programme of monitoring of the effects of radioactive discharges on the marine environment around United Kingdom nuclear sites is carried out by my Ministry to verify the satisfactory control of liquid radioactive waste discharges and to ensure that the resulting public radiation exposure is within nationally accepted limits.

This programme involves the sampling and analysis of fish and other environmental materials at various points along the south coast to assess the effects of discharges from establishments at Devonport, Winfrith and Dungeness. Samples taken in the Channel Islands also enable us to assess the effects of discharges from Cap de la Hague. The results of this monitoring are published and copies of the latest report are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

IRA (Extradition)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what talks he has had with his United States counterparts concerning the extradition of suspected Irish Republican Army terrorists from the United States of America.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We are working closely with the United States Administration to persuade the United States Senate to ratify the United Kingdom-United States supplementary extradition treaty. This measure would prevent suspected terrorists from avoiding extradition from the United States by claiming before the United States courts that their alleged crimes were politically motivated.

Syria

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of diplomatic relations with Syria.

Mr. Renton: Relations with Syria have been soured by the unjustified expulsion of three members of the diplomatic staff of Her Majesty's embassy at Damascus.

Contadora Process

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have taken place within the European Council about the implications for the Contadora process of the funding by the United States of America of the Contras in Nicaragua.

Mr. Eggar: Within the framework of European political co-operation there is regular discussion of questions relating to Central America. The last meeting of Foreign Ministers took place on 12 and 13 May.

EC Commission (Staff)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total number of persons employed by the European Economic Community Commission; what is the total cost of the Commission; and what were the comparable figures in 1976.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures requested, which cover the period during which Greece, Spain and Portugal joined the European Community are:

	1976	1986
Total number of persons employed by the Commission	7,983	10,881
Total cost of the Commission	814 mecu	1,049 mecu
Total Commission staff costs	228 mecu	699 mecu

These figures reflect the appropriations in the 1986 European Communities Budget and the 1976 Supplementary Budget No. 2 respectively.

International Year of Peace

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives his Department intends to take as part of the 1986 UN International Year of Peace; and if he has given support to organisations sponsoring special events to commemorate the Year of Peace.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) on 20 November 1985, at column 215. We believe that public funds are best spent directly on policies designed to further peace, and have not given support to organisations sponsoring special events to commemorate the year.

Hong Kong

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the hospital service available in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Hospital services in Hong Kong are satisfactorily provided for the territory's 5·4 million people and are administered by the Hong Kong Medical and Health Department. There are four hospital regions, each served by a regional hospital, one or more district hospitals and a number of general and specialist clinics. These provide a total of 24,638 hospital beds – a ratio of 4·5 hospital beds per 1,000 of the population. The construction of four more Government hospitals is planned whilst existing facilities continue to be extended and improved. Hospital charges are minimal and are waived for those in hardship irrespective of age, sex, race and religion.

Falkland Islands

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the resolution passed by the Falkland Islands Legislative Council on 28 May concerning the wishes of the islanders regarding their future; and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the resolution.

Mr. Eggar: The motion has already been publicised by the Falkland Islands Government Office. We have made clear on numerous occasions our commitment to defend the right of the Falkland Islanders to live under British sovereignty. Their wish to do so has never been in doubt.

EC (Internal Market)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the draft regulations of the Commission of the European Communities which in its judgment would need to be enacted to complete the harmonisation of the internal market; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mrs. Chalker: A list of some 300 measures which the Commission considers necessary appears in the White Paper "Completing the Internal Market" which it submitted to the European Council in June 1985, and which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with those trade and professional organisations in the United Kingdom whose interests are likely to be affected by measures necessary to complete the common internal market of the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: Ministers are in regular touch with a wide range of trade and professional organisations about the internal market. These organisations are in any case consulted by Government Departments on any specific Commission proposals which are likely to be of concern to them.

EC Commission (Legislative Proposals)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the number of occasions in 1980, and in each succeeding year when Her Majesty's Ministers declined to agree with a legislative proposal of the Commission of the European Economic Community, presented under article 100 of the treaty of Rome.

Mrs. Chalker: A substantial number of proposals are put forward by the Commission under article 100 each year. These proposals are rarely agreed to by the Council in their original form but are changed to reflect the views of member states and to be capable of adoption by the Council. The United Kingdom has played a full part in that process but it is not possible to enumerate the occasions on which proposals have been amended to reflect our views.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give or estimate the number of occasions in each of the years 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986 when the Commission of the European Economic Community has laid new regulations or amendments to those proposed, consequent to the opinions of the European Assembly.

Mrs. Chalker: The Commission reports each month to the European Parliament on the action it has taken on the Parliament's opinions. These reports are reproduced in the "Report of Proceedings" published as an annex to the Official Journal, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The reports show that the Commission frequently amends its proposals in response to the views expressed by the European Parliament. In the time available it has not been possible to calculate the number of such amendments over the period in question. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as the information is available.

Petty Officer John Anthony Black

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any British public sector employees, including members of Her Majesty's forces, or any person acting on their behalf, entered the apartment in an official capacity in Sabinillas, Spain, of the late Petty Officer John Anthony Black, Royal Navy, between 24 and 27 December 1983; and whether this issue was raised with the Spanish authorities in the recent Note Verbale.

Mr. Eggar: No Foreign and Commonwealth Office employee, or persons acting on its behalf, entered the apartment between 24 and 27 December 1983. There was therefore no such issue to raise with the Spanish authorities.

TRANSPORT

Iwade Bypass

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce his final proposals for a dual carriageway bypass of Iwade on the A249; and what is the target date for completion of the project.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect to announce the preferred route for an extended bypass of Iwade on the A249 later this year. The final proposals and timing of construction will depend on the outcome of the necessary statutory procedures. It may be possible to start construction at about the end of 1988, for completion two years later.

Roads (Construction)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the 20 contractors who have received the largest share of motorway and trunk road construction contracts in the past three years, giving for each contractor the total value of contracts received.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During the three years 1983, 1984 and 1985, motorway and trunk road construction contracts of over £100,000 each in value were awarded as follows:

	Total value of contracts £ million

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the motorway and trunk road schemes for which he intended to award a contract in the year ended 31 March but which are still outstanding.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Five contracts which we hoped to let in 1985-86 remain outstanding:

A27 Havant to Chichester
Tenders received; to be let next month

A303 Furze Hedge Improvement
Tenders received; to be let next month

A629 Kildwick to Beechcliffe
Tenders invited; to be let in August

M5 Warndon to Rashwood
Tenders to be invited next month

A30 Okehampton Bypass
Tenders to be invited next month

Motorways (Maintenance Costs)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent to date on maintenance on the M3 motorway on its most recently completed stretch.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Popham to Bar End section of the M3 opened to traffic last summer is still within the contractual maintenance period. The total cost of maintenance to date is approximately £255,000. This includes costs, which the Department will meet, of £47,000 for salting and snow clearing, £8,000 for repairs to safety fences and signs, and, exceptionally, about £100,000 to repair fire damage at the Alrcoford road (Spitfire) bridge, Winchester. The remainder of the cost will in the main be borne by the contractors.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how much has been spent to date on maintenance on the M27 between the junction with the M275 and the Hedge End interchange;

(2) how much has been spent to date on maintenance on the M275.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since this section of the M27 motorway opened to traffic in 1975, the total cost of maintenance incurred by the Department has been approximately £2·146 million.

Hampshire county council is the highway authority responsible for maintenance of the M275.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Members' Correspondence

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many letters were written to him by right hon. and hon. Members for the constituencies of Northern Ireland during the month of May.

Mr. Tom King: It is not my practice to comment on correspondence with hon. Members.

Prison Officers (Observation Duties)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will direct the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary to issue a police order on the lines of that recently issued by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the deployment of uniformed officers on plain cloths observation duties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary operates under the law. He is not subject to direction by the Secretary of State in the operational control of his force. However, I understand that uniformed officers are specially briefed by a senior officer before embarking on plain clothes observation duties.

Employment Act 1982

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost of processing to conclusion the separate Order in Council introducing the Trade Union Act 1982 into Northern Ireland law within (a) the Northern Ireland Civil Service and (b) Westminster.

Dr. Boyson: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Employment Act 1982, which deals with trade union matters. A draft Order-in-Council to replicate the 1982 Act was issued for consultation on 12 May 1986, and comments are waited. Expenditure on this order has not been costed separately and cannot be estimated reliably.

RUC (Stalker Report)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what effect the suspension of the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester, Mr. John Stalker, has on the preparation of his report on operations by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in County Armagh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: Mr. John Stalker was appointed on 24 May 1984 by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary to head a team of police officers from the Greater Manchester force to carry out an inquiry in Northern Ireland. I understand that he submitted an interim report to the Chief Constable on 18 September 1985, amd that it was sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions (NI) on 13 February 1986. On 4 March 1986, the Director directed that further investigations be undertaken.

I understand that this task will be completed by the same inquiry team, consisting of the same officers. The Chief Constable has, however, announced that, in view of the leave of absence of Mr. Stalker, and after consultation with and on the recommendation of Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary, he has asked Mr. Colin Sampson, the chief constable of West Yorkshire, to take over the leadership of the team.

The Chief Constable of the RUC stressed that he is anxious that the intended investigation should be completed quickly and professionally so that he may receive the DPP's directions.

ENERGY

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will describe the responsibilities, in relation to the routine management of licensed Magnox nuclear power stations, of (a) the licensee, (b) the Nuclear Installations Inpectorate and (c) the staff of his Department in determining what extent of expenditure on improving safety features is reasonably practicable; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will describe the responsibilities, in relation to the 20-year safety reviews of Magnox power stations, of (a) the licensee, (b) the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and (c) the staff of his Department in determining what extent of expenditure on improving safety features is reasonably practicable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The answers to both questions are the same. The licensee is legally responsible for ensuring that his operations are safe. To the extent that maintenance of safety requires expenditure, it is for the licensee to assess the costs against the overall economics of the plant, and to decide between making necessary improvements or closing the plant down. The Health and Safety Executive, of which Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate is a part, has a duty to see that appropriate standards are developed, achieved and maintained by the licensee. It sets the licence terms and checks compliance by assessment and inspection, and has the power to require a plant to be closed if any necessary improvements are not made. Departmental officials advise my right hon. Friend on safety policy and on overall expenditure proposals, but do not participate in determining the extent of expenditure required for improvement of safety.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people are working directly and indirectly in support of the United Kingdom nuclear energy programme.

Mr. Goodlad: About 44,000 people are employed directly by BNFL, UKAEA, NNC and in the nuclear specific work of the electricity generating boards. There are, in addition, many thousands of people in the manufacturing and service industries employed on the industry's major capital projects, in maintaining and servicing the industry's existing sites and in providing local infrastructure. For example, BNFL has estimated that in addition to their directly employed staff, a further 50,000 jobs are supported by their capital investment programme. Well over 100,000 jobs depend directly or indirectly on the industry.

District Heating (Rating)

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to make a statement on the criteria for rating assessment applicable to combined heat and power district heating consortia.

Mr. David Hunt: Responsibility for rating policy in England and Wales rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I am aware that preliminary estimates of rates charges for combined heat and power-district heating schemes, derived from the probable capital costs, exceed those that result from the application of the formulae used in rating established energy supply utilities and the implications of this are now being considered.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions, and in which years, and in what amounts, plutonium from British Nuclear Fuels Limited operated reactors at Calder Hall and Chapel Cross has been submitted to (a) Euratom safeguards and (b) International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Office of Gas Supply

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the establishment of the Office of Gas Supply.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Gas Bill, currently before Parliament, provides for the setting up of an Office of Gas Supply to regulate the affairs of the gas supply industry. It is intended that, subject to the enactment of the Bill, the body will be established later this year as an independent non-ministerial Department headed by the Director-General of Gas Supply responsible to Parliament for the expenditure of the office. Parliament will be asked to vote an allocation of funds for the office in the Summer Supplementary Estimate. It is intended that the costs estimated to be £1·16 million in 1986-87 (including a running cost limit of £1·056 million) will be recovered from authorisation fees paid by gas suppliers and the estimate will, therefore, be a token one.

EMPLOYMENT

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Paymaster General if he will list those measures introduced by his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Trippier: Overall responsibility for the small firms sector was transferred to the Department of Employment on 3 September 1985. A sharper focus has been given to that work with the transfer and the promotion of enterprise and job creation are now major priorities in the Department's objectives. The Department also monitors and seeks to influence relevant measures being introduced by other Departments, so that they will benefit the sector, whilst in England the regional enterprise units represent and promote the Department's interest in enterprise, small firms, deregulation and tourism at a regional and local level. Measures introduced by the Department of Employment in the past year designed specifically to help small firms are as follows:

Deregulation

The Government's commitment to reduce unnecessary burdens on business has particularly benefited small firms. Two White Papers have been published on deregulation — "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571) in July 1985 and "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794) on 22 May 1986. The recent White Paper sets out progress since "Lifting the Burden" and announces a package of 80 further proposals. Of these further proposals, 14 concern employment and health and safety legislation.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

This scheme was extended for a further three years in the 1986 Budget. The cost to borrowers through the premium payable has been reduced from 5 to 2·5 per cent.

Local Enterprise Agency Grant Scheme

A five year scheme of financial assistance designed to establish a network of viable self-supporting enterprise agencies was introduced on 1 April 1986. £2·5 million in grants is being made available in the first year.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

The Manpower Services Commission has expanded this from 65,000 places in 1985-86 to 86,000 places in 1986-87. The 13-week qualifying period of unemployment has been reduced to eight weeks whilst greater emphasis is now being given to counselling and training for applicants.

Advice and Information

A major priority has been to make information and advice more accessible to the self-employed and small business men through the small firms service, local enterprise agencies, the Manpower Services Commission's agencies, the Manpower Services Commission's jobcentres and the publication "Action for Jobs".

Training

The Manpower Services Commission has been refocussing its adult training programme at the Department's request to take greater account of small firms' training needs. Its training for enterprise budget has been increased from £14·3 million in 1985-86 to £18·8 million in 1986-87 and the number of people expected to benefit is over 46,000 (as against 25,000 in 1985-86).

Late Payment of Bills

A practical guidance booklet entitled "Payment on Time" was issued on 19 May 1986 in conjunction with a number of industry organisations with the aim of fostering closer co-operation between buyers and suppliers and reducing the time taken by customers to pay their bills. This has been widely circulated to both public and private sector organisations.

Regional Enterprise Units

Eight regional enterprise units have been established in England to promote the Department's interests in enterprise, small firms, deregulation and tourism at a regional and local level.

Inner Cities Initiative

The Government launched this initiative on 6 February 1986, under the overall responsibility of the Paymaster General, to improve the impact of Government spending in inner city areas on the employment problem of residents and to work up new approaches. Task forces have been set up in eight pilot inner city areas and among other ideas, they will certainly be considering additional help to small businesses in their areas, and how new business can be attracted to them.

Health and Safety

The Health and Safety Commission now has an employer representative nominee with special responsibility for the interests of small firms. In addition, training for inspectors on the problems of small firms has been introduced by the Health and Safety Executive.

Employing People

The Department is proposing to exempt firms with fewer than ten employees from the requirement to allow a woman to return to work within 29 weeks after the birth of a child. The Department has also produced a simplified guide to employment legislation for small firms' advisers, along with a model employment form and notice board kit aimed to help small firms in particular. In addition, The Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service has published a booklet for small firms with information on various aspects of employing people.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the operation of the Commission for Racial Equality's code of practice for the elimination of racial discrimination and promotion of equality of opportunity in employment.

Mr. Lang: Information about the operation of this code is given in the Commission for Racial Equality's annual report for 1985, which was laid before the House on 12 June.

A growing number of employers are finding that the code's recommendations provide a useful and acceptable framework against which to review personnel practices and procedures.

The Department of Employment's race relations employment advisory service continues to give priority to advising employers on the code's provisions.

Community Programme

Mr. Frank Field asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will indicate the 10 local authority areas where the Manpower Services Commission has the highest spending on the community programme, VPP and YTS programmes and the sums spent in each area during 1985;

(2) if he will indicate the total sums spent in each of the 10 local authority areas where the Manpower Services Commission has the highest spending on the community programme, VPP and YTS on each of the three programmes in 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Lang: The total sum spent in each of the 10 local authority areas where the Manpower Services Commission has the highest spending is not readily available, and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Paymaster General if he will specify the 10 organisations and 10 local authorities, respectively, which currently employ the largest number of community programme participants in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lang: The 10 organisations whose current agreements have the largest number of participants are as follows:

National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders
Community Task Force Community Rural Aid
Keep Britain Tidy Group
National Elfrida Rathbone Society
Sunderland Council for Voluntary Service
Age Concern (Avon)
Manchester Diocesan Church of England Council for Social Aid
Volunteer Centre Glasgow
Community Roots Trust

The 10 local authorities whose current agreements have the largest number of participants are as follows:

Leeds City Council
Glasgow District Council
Birmingham City Council (Planning Department)
Kent County Council
Rochdale Metropolitan Borough Council
City of Bradford Metropolitan Council
Hartlepool Borough Council

Newcastle City Council
Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council
Staffordshire County Council

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General what is the unemployment rate for West Indian men under 25 years of age; what is the unemployment rate for Asian men under 25 years of age; and what is the unemployment rate for white men under 25 years of age.

Mr. Lang: According to the labour force survey, in the spring of 1985 in Great Britain the rates of unemployment among men aged under 25 years were 35 per cent. for West Indians, 31 per cent. for Asians and 18 per cent. for whites. The figures relate to those who said they were without a job and actively looking for work as a proportion of those economically active.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General what percentage of white people on YTS get places with employers after the programme; and what percentage of West Indians on YTS get places with employers after the programme.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a monthly follow-up survey of all young people leaving YTS. The latest results, covering young people who left YTS between 1 April and 31 December 1985, show that around 60 per cent. of white leavers and around 35 per cent. of black leavers of African or Caribbean descent were in employment some three months after completing their training. Information relating specifically to West Indians is not available.

Wages (Arrears)

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will publish for each year from 1979 to 1985 details of recovery of arrears by the Wages Inspectorate for workers covered by the clothing manufacturing wages council in the same form as in his reply on 23 May, Official Report, column 358-60.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is given in the following table.

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
(a) Arrears assessed but not recovered £	1,863	8,558	12,258	18,886	33,704	27,236	37,357
(b) (a) above as a percentage of arrears paid	6 per cent.	14 per cent.	22 per cent.	31 per cent.	73 per cent.	31 per cent.	59 per cent.
(c) arrears which it was not considered practicable to pursue £	*1,863	*8,558	*12,258	11,889	25,692	21,150	35,195
(d) (c) above as a percentage of arrears paid	6 per cent.	14 per cent.	22 per cent.	20 per cent.	56 per cent.	24 per cent.	55 per cent.
(e) workers for whom arrears were assessed but not recovered	16	62	93	164	199	133	199
(f) (e) above as a percentage of workers paid arrears	2 per cent.	5 per cent.	10 per cent.	26 per cent.	40 per cent.	20 per cent.	30 per cent.
(g) workers from for whom it was considered not practicable to pursue arrears	16	62	93	118	161	112	186
(h) (g) above as a percentage of workers paid arrears	*2 per cent.	*5 per cent.	*10 per cent.	15 per cent.	32 per cent.	17 per cent.	28 per cent.

* These figures include data relating to arrears waived. Information concerning arrears which it was considered not practicable to pursue is not separately identifiable for 1979, 1980 and 1981.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will explain why non-recovery of arrears assessed as due by the Wages Inspectorate has increased since 1979; and why it is considered impracticable to pursue arrears.

Mr. Trippier: The increase in the proportion of arrears identified but not recovered by the Wages Inspectorate is attributable to rises in both the number of workers choosing to forgo payment and the number of cases where it is inappropriate or impracticable to pursue recovery action. Decisions by the Wages Inspectorate not to pursue arrears are taken only after careful consideration of all the circumstances, including the ultimate likelihood of success bearing in mind such factors as the financial state of the business concerned and the adequacy of evidence to support legal proceedings.

Home Workers

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will publish for each year from 1979 to 1985 the number of establishments where the records of home workers were examined by wages inspectors, the number of establishments making use of home workers who were found to have been underpaid and the number of home workers who were interviewed by the inspectorate separately for workers covered by the clothing manufacturing, the hat, cap and millinery and the retail bespoke tailoring wages councils.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is given in the following tables.

Clothing Manufacturing Wages Council

MSC Assistance (Calderdale)

Mr. Galley asked the Paymaster General what has been the total level of assistance in terms of (a) finance and (b) people assisted as a result of schemes operated by the Manpower Services Commission in the Calderdale metropolitan borough area in each year since 1974.

Mr. Lang: I regret that I am unable to answer the question in the precise form requested. I will write to my hon. Friend shortly giving such information as is available.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Paymaster General if he will bring forward proposals to ensure that allowances are made in the case of young people afflicted by special learning difficulties or dyslexia in applications for or tests and training during YTS courses.

Mr. Trippier: The special needs of young people are well known to the careers service from its contacts while they are still at school, and will be taken fully into account when advising young people on YTS, and in particular when giving endorsements for entry into premium places and places in receipt of permanent additional funding for the disabled.

Design of tests of competence will increasingly be a matter for industry, particularly through lead bodies whose responsibility will be to set standards of competence in the workplace. These bodies will be expected to give particular attention to the needs of young people with learning difficulties, including dyslexia.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a list of travel-to-work areas, indicating for each one which parliamentary constituencies form part of it and a list of parliamentary constituencis showing of which travel-to-work area or areas it forms a part, giving in each case the latest available unemployment rate figures, where available.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 11 June 1986, c. 197]: Following is the available information. The table shows each parliamentary constituency of Great Britain, together with those travel-to-work areas whose boundaries cover all, or the majority of, that constituency area. In some cases a travel-to-work area covers a large number of constituencies, for example the London travel-to-work area. Unemployment rates for travel-to-work areas as at 10 April 1986 were published in table 2.4 of the June 1986 edition of "Employment Gazette", which is in the Library.

A list showing which parliamentary constituencies form part of each travel-to-work area is not available, except at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Residential Accommodation)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many, and which, health authorities have sought an extension of the 1987 deadline for disposing of surplus housing stock, as provided for by his Department's circular HC(85)19.

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities have been asked not to implement any part of their plans for rationalising property holdings that involves giving staff notice to quit, and told that they will be given further advice about the implementation of plans when the National Health Service management board has completed a review of the conditions under which staff occupy residential accommodation. The requirements to dispose of all surplus property by 31 December 1987 no longer applies.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the text of his Department's advice to health authorities giving effect to his policy that no one living in National Health Service nurses' homes is to be made homeless as a result of rationalising the National Health Service residential estate.

Mr. Hayhoe: The advice has been published as circular HC(86)8. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish guidelines on what constitutes suitable alternative accommodation, with particular regard to proximity to work and its cost in respect of the programme of rationalisation of the National Health Service residential estate.

Mr. Hayhoe: These matters will be considered as part of a review of the conditions under which staff occupy residential accommodation which the National Health Service management board is undertaking. In the meantime, health authorities have been asked not to give any staff notice to quit without the approval of the Department.

Private Residential Homes

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the maximum levels of benefit payable in respect of individuals in a private residential home for (a) the elderly, (b) the mentally ill and (c) the mentally handicapped.

Mr. Major: The maximum amounts of supplementary benefit payable to people in private residential homes are set out in Schedule 1A to the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Regulations 1983 as amended.

For claimants in residential care homes the limits for old age, mental illness and mental handicap are £120, £130 and £150 respectively.

For claimants in nursing homes, these same limits are £170, £180 and £200.

Mammographic Units

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the current total annual cost of providing mammographic units under the National Health Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information on which to make such an estimate is not collected centrally.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by health authority of the numbers of mammographic units which are available under the National Health Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: While information on the number of mammographic units is not collected routinely the following table sets out those districts which, as at January 1986, are understood to have mammographic machines which had been installed or upgraded since 1975.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many health authorities currently have agreements with private health companies for the provision of mammography units; and what is the average cost to the National Health Service per patient visit of attending such units.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not collected centrally.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total expenditure on mobility allowance; and, of this, how much is spent (a) on administration and (b) on appeals against decisions.

Mr. Newton: In 1985-86 payments of mobility allowance amounted to an estimated £430 million. No figures are available for the administrative cost of appeals against decisions, but the latest available information indicates that in 1984-85 the total cost of administering the allowance, including appeals, was about £10 million.

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current total number of claimants for mobility allowance; and how many new claimants there have been for each year since 1980.

Mr. Newton: Four hundred and twenty six thousand three hundred people are currently receiving mobility allowance. The net increase in the number of recipients for each year since 1980 is as follows:

1980	*46,200
1981	25,800
1982	42,700
1983	49,000
1984	51,000
1985	53,100

* The 1980 figure is high because it includes claimants in the 61-65 age group who could claim for the first time for September 1979 onwards under the phasing arrangements.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received (a) from individuals and (b) from organisations on the eligibility requirements of mobility allowance; and what has been the nature of these representations.

Mr. Newton: We regularly receive a wide range of representations from individuals and organisations of disabled people about the qualifying conditions for mobility allowance. These include representations to extend or abolish the age limits; to include disabled people who can walk but need guidance or supervision to make use of their walking ability; to include specific groups such as the blind and deaf-blind, the mentally handicapped and autistic children; to include people with specific medical conditions such as epilepsy or agoraphobia; to take account of personal factors such as the availability of public transport and the ability to use it; and to make the allowance means-tested.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for each year since 1980, how many renewal claims have been made for mobility allowance; of these, how many have been unsuccessful; how many have gone on to appeal; and how many of these have been successful;

(2) what are the principal reasons why renewal claimants of mobility allowance fail to have their mobility allowance renewed; and how many have been disallowed mobility allowance despite no change in their medical condition.

Mr. Newton: Information about the number of renewal claims for mobility allowance in 1980 and 1981 is not available. The figures for subsequent years are as follows:

	Number of renewal claims decided	Number of renewal claims unsuccessful
1982	21,240	4,110
1983	19,500	3,050
1984	23,950	4,050
1985	27,520	5,020

I regret that our records do not include the reasons for disallowance of renewal claims or information about the number of these claims which went to appeal and their outcome.

Social Security (Hippies)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has any plans to set up a register of social security claims by hippies;

(2) what evidence he has of duplicate social security claims by hippies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: The Department's Wales and south-western region has set up an index of supplementary benefits claims made by large groups of nomadic claimants. This is a fraud prevention device which helps to confirm their identity when, in the course of their travels, they make claims in different offices. The index has been used in handling claims from members of the hippy convoy. Similar action will be taken in other areas if appropriate. A number of claims have been refused because officials were not satisfied with evidence of identity produced by the claimants, and some claims which appear to be fraudulent are being investigated with a view to prosecution if appropriate.

Child Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the nature of the Government's commitment in regard to the uprating of child benefit; and if he will make it his policy that future changes will be planned so that the uprating of child benefit corresponds to the changes in income tax allowances.

Mr. Newton: Our objective is to maintain a balanced programme of family support providing all families with a contribution towards the cost of bringing up children, in the form of Child Benefit, whilst at the same time directing extra help to low income families. The Government remain firmly committed to child benefit, but consider that increases in its level are most appropriately considered at each uprating in the context of this overall objective for family support, and of the balance of social security expenditure as a whole.

Local Offices (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the staff of the local and regional offices of his Department in Wales at each professional level are competent to carry out their business through the medium of both the English and Welsh languages.

Mr. Major: The information is as follows:

	Total	Welsh speakers	per cent.
Assistant Secretary	1
Senior Principal	2
Principal	13
Senior Executive Officer	47	5	10·63
Higher Executive Officer	213	26	12·2
Executive Officer/ Local Officer I	1,128	145	12·85
Clerical Officer/ Local Officer II	2,299	184	8
Clerical Assistant	578	27	4·6
Typist	104	6	5·76
Others	120	4	3·3
Total	4,505	397	8·81

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria as to the linguistic competence of the candidates in Welsh and English are used by his Department in employing staff at each professional level at the local and regional offices in Wales.

Mr. Major: There are no criteria as to the Welsh speaking skills of local and regional office staff recruited in Wales. The Department is an equal opportunity employer and does not discriminate either against or in favour of Welsh speaking candidates.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria are employed by his Department in deciding which forms, leaflets, posters and other printed matter should be in (a) Welsh and (b) bilingual Welsh/English.

Mr. Major: In considering the publication of forms, leaflets and posters in the Welsh language the Department of Health and Social Security takes the following factors into consideration:

(i) the importance of the communication;
(ii) whether the response to it is to be processed locally;
(iii) whether there is sufficient continuing demand to make publication in Welsh economically viable.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local offices of his Department in Wales show the poster, "Welsh Forms and Leaflets are Available at This Office – Please ask the Receptionist".

Mr. Major: This poster is currently displayed in 20 of the Department's local offices in Wales.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the external legal advice he has sought on the legality of circular S51/85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 10 June at column 146.

Family Credit

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will include (a) the Child Poverty Action Group and (b) other representative bodies concerned with low-income families in his review of the family credit scheme; and what written representations he has so far received about his review.

Mr. Newton: In reconsidering the mechanism by which family credit is to be paid my right hon. Friend is having regard to all the concerns which have been expressed on this issue, including those by the Child Poverty Action Group and other bodies. Since the reconsideration was announced several further written representations have been received, including one from the Child Poverty Action Group.

Potassium Iodate Tablets

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the answer of 3 June, Official Report, column 541, (1) when he expects to provide a substantive answer to the question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about the length of time potassium iodate tablets have been held in stock;

(2) when he expects to provide a substantive answer to the question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about the shelf life of potassium iodate tablets.

Mr. Whitney: I replied to the hon. Member yesterday.

Reye's Syndrome

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the report of the British Reye's syndrome surveillance was completed; when it was received by the Committee on Safety of Medicines; when it was discussed; and what was the conclusions of the report and the views of the committee.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to him on 13 May at column 448 and to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 10 June at columns 145-46.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) when the Committee on Safety of Medicines met to discuss the relation between Reye's syndrome and the taking of aspirin; what new evidence it discussed; if he will list the occasions, since the meeting in 1982, when

Reye's syndrome was discussed; when the committee was informed that the United States authorities intended to require warning labels on aspirin; if the committee had been informed of the decline in the incidence in Reye's syndrome in the United States of America that followed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) which manufacturers of aspirin, or organisations representing them, made representations to the Committee on Safety of Medicines regarding the taking of aspirin by children and its possible link with Reye's syndrome; and when they did so.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Committee on Safety of Medicines, which has since 1982 been keeping under review the possibility of a link between Reye's syndrome and aspirin, began in March 1985 to re-examine all the available evidence. In April 1985 the Committee gave further consideration to this issue and advised that the available evidence had not established a causal link between aspirin use and Reye's syndrome. In March 1986 the Committee again reviewed all available evidence on Reye's syndrome and aspirin including: the report of the pilot phase of the United States of America public health services study on Reye's syndrome and medications, published in the New England Journal of Medicine on 3 October 1985; "United States of America Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Reports on Reye's Syndrome for 1985", published on 7 February 1986; a proposed rule by the United States Food and Drug Administration on labelling for oral aspirin-containing drug products published in the Federal Register on 17 December 1985; and a preliminary communication from the authors of the uncompleted Reye's syndrome risk factor study based on the British Reye's syndrome surveillance scheme. In April and May 1986 the committee gave further consideration to the possible link between aspirin and Reye's syndrome and possible steps to reduce the use of aspirin by children, including consideration of papers provided by the Aspirin Foundation and the Proprietary Association of Great Britain and a summary of the views of some Companies.

On 29 May the Committee concluded that while the causes of Reye's syndrome are not clearly defined, and its epidemiology in the United Kingdom differs from that in the United States of America, aspirin may be a contributory factor to the causation of Reye's syndrome in some children in the United Kingdom. It accordingly recommended that aspirin should no longer be given to children aged under 12 years unless specifically indicated and endorsed the programme of action to be carried through by the pharmaceutical industry and the Health Departments as set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 10 June at columns 145-46.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in full the recommendations of the Committee on Safety of Medicines on the taking of aspirin by children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 10 June at columns 145-46 and to the letter from the chairman of the Committee on Safety of Medicines of the same date, a copy of which is in the Library, in which the committee set out in full its advice to doctors, dentists and pharmacists. The committee has also prepared a more detailed scientific statement on Reye's syndrome and aspirin which I understand will be published this week in the CSM Update series in the British Medical Journal.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the action taken by his Department to explore the possibility of a link between the taking of aspirin and Reye's syndrome; and if he will estimate its cost.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Department has kept in close touch with studies by the Committee on Safety of Medicines of all the available evidence, from this country and overseas, of possible links between aspirin and Reye's syndrome. This evidence includes the preliminary results of the Reye's syndrome risk factor study, run jointly in the United Kingdom by the British Paediatric Association and the communicable disease surveillance centre of the public health laboratory service. The study is conducted by members of the CDSC but it is difficult to separate out the cost of this work from the total cost of CDSC to public funds.

Residential Homes

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the present number of persons resident in homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector; and how many persons the Government estimate will be in these homes in (i) three years' time, (ii) five years' time and (iii) 10 years' time;

(2) what was the level of Government expenditure on homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985;

(3) what number of homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector had their licences withdrawn, and for what reasons, in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985;

(4) what representations he has received regarding patient care in homes subject to the Registered Homes Act 1984.

Mr. Whitney: The Registered Homes Act 1984 applies only to voluntary and privately run residential care homes and nursing homes; it does not apply to homes in the public sector.

The number of people or places in England in registered residential care homes at 31 March 1985 and of beds in nursing homes at 31 December 1984 was as follows:

	Numbers
Residential care homes for elderly and younger disabled people	98,758 residents
Residential care homes for people with mental disorders	10,146 places
Nursing homes	42,898 beds

It is not practicable to estimate how many people will be in homes in the future.

Expenditure by health and local authorities in England under contractual arrangements for the care of people in these homes and payments of supplementary benefit board and lodging allowances in Great Britain to people in them has been as follows:

	Health Authorities £ million	Local Authorities £ million	Supplementary Benefit Board and Lodging Allowances	£ million
1979-80	23	59	1979	10
1980-81	29	72	1980	18
1981-82	32	84	1981	23
1982-83	34	96	1982	39
1983-84	35	104	1983	105
1984-85	40	†	1984	*190
1985-86	†		1985	†

* Estimate
† Not available

For information about registrations withdrawn I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 6 May at column 76 and on 15 May at column 532. The reasons for registrations being withdrawn ranged from unfitness to run a home to inadequate accommodation, staffing, services or facilities. A few representations have been received about the standard of care in these homes. The two-year study which the Department's Social Services Inspectorate is carrying out into the effects of the new legislation will consider the impact of the changes on the quality of care provided in the homes. A report is expected around the turn of the year.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what research has been carried out into the health effects on children of their use of visual display units; what plans Her Majesty's Government have for further research into this area; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received regarding the health effects on children of their use of visual display units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: No research is being undertaken at present and none is planned as I am advised it is not warranted. There have been no representations about health effects on children, and I am advised that there is no indication that children in general are at risk from using visual display units.

I am advised that extensive surveys both in the United Kingdom and abroad for electromagnetic radiation from visual display units have shown these to be below the maximum limits for continuous occupational exposure. Poor viewing conditions may present ergonomic problems and badly adjusted or maintained sets can effect people who are susceptible to migraine or epilepsy.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any changes are to be made to cash limits or gross running costs for his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for Class XIV Vote 1 (Hospital and Community Health and Other Services, England) will be increased by £49,640,000 (from £9,620,572,000 to £9,670,212,000) and that for Class XIV, Vote 3 (Miscellaneous Health and Personal Social Services, England) by £360,000 (from £389,061,000 to £389,421,000 (£300,000 of this change represents an increase in Departmental gross running costs). These increases should enable services to continue to be delivered and developed as planned following the decision to implement, from July 1986, the recommendations of the Review Bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine, as announced by my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister, on 22 May 1986.

The cash limit for Class XV, Vote 5 (Administration and Miscellaneous Services) will be increased by £5,360,000 from £1,163,288,000 to £1,168,648,000. The increase is in respect of an agency payment of £6,800,000 to the Department of Employment, partially offset by recoveries totalling £1,440,000 from the National Insurance Fund. This reflects an increase in the costs of administration of the Unemployment Benefit Service as one consequence of the special employment measures announced by my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget Statement on 18 March 1986.

As a result of these changes, the gross running cost limit of the Department of Health and Social Security is increased by £7,100,000 from £1,808,740,000 to £1,815,840,000.

The public expenditure costs of these changes have been charged to the Reserve and do not add to the public expenditure planning total.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Shipbuilders (External Finance Limit)

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the external finance limit for British Shipbuilders for 1986-87.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The external financing limit for British Shipbuilders for 1986-87 is being increased by £57 million from £73 million to £130 million. This increase primarily reflects the additional costs to British Shipbuilders this year of its restructuring programme announced on 14 May at column 705, including the cost of establishing British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. The increase also reflects the fact that significant payments for vessels under construction will not now be received until 1987-88. Provision for this additional funding in the form of public dividend capital is subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate. The increase in the EFL will be charged to the Reserve net of some offsetting savings on existing programmes. Therefore there is no increase in the public expenditure planning total.

Calderdale

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total amount of regional aid given to the Calderdale metropolitan borough area as a result of assisted area status in each year from 1974-75 to 1982-83; and what other aid has been given to the area by his Department in each year from 1974-75 to 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Amounts of regional selective assistance paid to companies in the Calderdale metropolitan borough area were as follows:

1974-75	97,892
1975-76	246,656
1976-77	195,166
1977-78	221,449
1978-79	277,883
1979-80	648,403
1980-81	622,667
1981-82	475,245
1982-83	523,744

Details of other aid are not available in the form requested.

ESPRIT

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of applications and amounts of those applications by each of the countries involved against the size of the ESPRIT budget.

Mr. Pattie: Information of this nature is supplied to member states on a confidential basis and its disclosure is a matter for the Commission, under the ESPRIT regulations. I am therefore asking my officials to write to the Commission on my hon. Friend's behalf with his request.

Inflatable Dinghies and Airbeds

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many deaths have resulted from accidents involving inflatable dinghies and airbeds in the last five years.

Mr. Howard: The only information available at reasonable cost relating specifically to fatal accidents involving inflatable dinghies and airbeds is produced by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. It is based on drownings reported in the local press and may therefore miss some cases. The figures available for drownings involving an inflatable, which would exclude professional inflatable craft, are as follows:

	Numbers
1983	3
1984	7
1985	5
1986*	3

*To date.

The Royal Life Saving Society produced information on drownings in 1982 and 1983 based on police reports. These include a category called "playing on rafts and inflatables" for which they recorded the following numbers:

	Numbers
1982	7
1983	8

Chemical Industry (Environmental Controls)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received about the chemical industry's compliance with environmental controls.

Mr. Peter Morrison: None, but the chemical industry's record of compliance with environmental regulations is good. The industry devotes considerable resources to the protection of the environment.

Northern Region (Industrial Base)

Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to commission an up-to-date report on the future industrial base for the northern region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no plans to commission such a report. My Department already keeps in close touch with the industrial situation in the regions through its regional offices.

Copyright Law

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he proposes that changes should be made to the existing provisions of copyright law relating to commissioned works of art; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: As recently announced in the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation" Cmnd. 9712 the Government have concluded that it is unnecessary and undesirable to change either the basic ownership provision or the existing specific exceptions covering commissioned works of art in the Copyright Act 1956. However, since publication of the White Paper we have had further representations on the subject and we will look at the matter again in the light of these representations.

High Technology Products

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidelines his Department gives to key British industries on the purchase of high technology products; what assessment he has made of the implications for the United Kingdom aero-engine industry of a decision to place abroad the orders for the new Boeing 747 replacement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The major industries in the public sector have expressed their support for the Government's public purchasing initiative. This encourages purchasers, as a matter of enlightened self-interest, to use their purchasing power in a positive way to help develop the design, technology and international competitiveness of their suppliers. It does not lessen the need for suppliers to win business on merit.

My Department is in touch with Rolls-Royce about the engines which it is offering for the Boeing 747 aircraft. British Airways is evaluating the quotations it has received from the major aero-engine manufacturers, and when it has completed its evaluation it will put proposals to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

A330 and A340 Projects

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy towards support for the A330 and the A340 projects; if his Department will take steps to seek to promote an active British participation for engines, airframe and avionics in these projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: My Department fully supports, in principle, the development of the Airbus family to cover a wider market range, and hopes that British airframe, aero-engine and avionics manufacturers will be able to participate in new Airbus projects that prove to have strong prospects of commercial viability. Airbus Industrie and the industrial partners are currently engaged in detailed studies of the A330/A340 projects and, until they have reached their own conclusions it is not possible for Governments to form a view on them. Any request for launch aid to meet the residual requirements for finance not met from the private sector would be carefully considered on its merits in the context of the financial constraints within which the Government must work.

Departmental Advisory Services

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about problems caused by the high level of demand for his Department's business and technical advisory services.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

WALES

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those measures introduced within his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Department has continued to encourage small businesses in Wales against the background of the very wide range of measures introduced by this Department including, for example, those about deregulation described in the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers", Cmnd. 9794, on 22 May 1986.

Counselling and Advisory Services

The Welsh Development Agency administers the counselling service in Wales and the agency, Mid Wales Development and the Wales Tourist Board continue to provide a range of advisory services for the benefit of small firms. On 1 January 1986 the Small Firms Centre, previously administered by the Department, was transferred to the Welsh Development Agency and we believe this merging of the counselling service and centre will provide a more effective service to its clients.

Local Enterprise Agencies

We continue to support local enterprise agencies in Wales and have approved the registration of two new agencies during the past 12 months and are considering applications from a further three. We are also giving urgent consideration as to how best the future funding of local enterprise agencies in Wales might be arranged and expect to make an announcement shortly.

Rural Enterprise Initiative

Many of the elements of the rural enterprise initiative which we announced on 24 March will be of particular benefit to small firms. They include, for example, streamlined administrative and more flexible security arrangements for loans to new and small firms.

Motorway and Trunk Road Construction

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the 10 contractors who have received the largest share of motorway and trunk road construction contracts in the past three years, giving for each contractor the total value of contracts received.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

	Total value of contracts £
1. Cementation Construction Ltd.	*14,695,224
2. Thyssen (GB) Ltd.	†14,482,798
3. Taylor Woodrow Construction Ltd.	‡14,304,781
4. Costain Civil Engineering Ltd.	||13,649,999
5. Balfour Beatty Ltd.	10,674,913
6. A. Monk and Co. plc.	10,338,819
7. John Laing Construction Ltd.	9,810,216
8. Amey Roadstone Construction Ltd.	8,841,076
9. McTay Construction Ltd.	4,111,371
10. Christiani and Nielsen Ltd.	2,014,446

* Includes £13,649,999 in Joint Venture with Costain Civil Engineering Ltd.

† Includes £14,304,781 in Joint Venture with Taylor Woodrow Construction Ltd.

‡ In Joint Venture with Thyssen (GB) Ltd
In Joint Venture with Cementation Construction Ltd.

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all road construction contracts which his Department intends to award in 1986-87, showing in each case the total value of the contract and the expenditure likely to be incurred in that year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Subject to the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures, the completion of engineering design and the availability of resources we hope to let contracts for the following major schemes in 1986-87:

A55 Glan Conwy to Conwy Morfa (Conwy Crossing);
A483 Gresford-Pulford Bypass;
A40 Haverfordwest Relief Roads; and A487 Pont Rhyd Llwyncelyn.

In addition, we expect to let some contracts for schemes costing less than £1 million. Schemes in this category are not programmed for a start in a specific year and the choice of project will depend on their state of preparedness and on the availability of resources.

It is not possible to give the cost of the contracts or of the expenditure incurred in 1986-87 since this will depend on the value of the accepted tenders and the contractors' programmes.

Premises (Powers of Entry and Search)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I will write to my hon. Friend and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Children with Special Educational Needs

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of children entering secondary education in Wales have special educational needs; and if he will publish such figures for each local education authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in the form requested is not available. The latest available figures relating to special education are given in section 7 of "Statistics of Education in Wales", No. 10, 1985, a copy of which is in the Library.

NHS (General Managers)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Wales to what extent general managers have been appointed at district health authority and unit level in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: District general managers have been appointed in all nine district health authorities in Wales and 29 of the proposed 32 unit general manager appointments have been made.

National Museum of Wales

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will request the Museums and Galleries Commission to undertake a formal investigation into the administration of the National Museum of Wales and in particular the conservation of the Welsh national collection of works of art; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. Under the terms of the museum's royal charter, the council is responsible for the management of the museum. It has set up a full independent inquiry into the conduct and management of the department of art and a report is expected shortly.

GCSE (Representations)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many letters he has received to date from (a) organisations and (b) individuals calling for a 12 month postponement in introducing the new General Certificate of Secondary Education examination in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) on 9 June in column 73.

Cardigan School of Dancing

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if the Cardigan School of Dancing Ltd. is an institution registered with his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Department holds no information on this institution; it is not registered as an independent school within the provisions of section 70 of the Education Act 1944.

Refuse Disposal

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by local authority and for all of Wales (a) the number of people employed in refuse collection in 1979-80 and the year for which the most recent figures are available and (b) the number of people employed in street cleansing in 1979-80 and the year for which the most recent figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Numbers of staff employed by Welsh local authorities on refuse collection and disposal are given below. Information relating to the more detailed service breakdown requested is not available centrally. Information for individual authorities are held only at all-service level.

Local authority staff employed in refuse collection and disposal (Wales)

OVERSEAS AND DEVELOPMENT

Pensions

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the figures of the total paid out of the pension fund of the Federation of Central Africa public service each year since the dissolution of the federation, specifying that part devoted to the actual payment of pensions and that part devoted to administration expenses.

Mr. Raison: The figures are as follows:

	Pensions and other benefits Z$ '000	Administrative expenses Z$ '000
1964	2,691	5
1965	1,552	11
1966	1,172	14

Notes:
(1) All amounts are Zimbabwe dollars (or Rhodesian pounds wher applicable).
(2) Figures are for the year ending 31 July, expect for 1964 which covers the seven months ending 31 July.
(3) Figures for 1985 are not yet available.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made with the consolidation of widows and orphans pension funds relating to the Overseas Civil Service and the application of the proceeds from the sale of assets held by the separate funds.

Mr. Raison: Last year the assets of the four Indian family pension funds were realised and the proceeds paid over to the Exchequer in return for the guaranteed payment of all existing and future pensions. Similar arrangements are in preparation for the colonial widows and orphans pension funds for which the British Government have assumed responsibility under the pensions takeover programme. These arrangements will result in significant savings in administrative costs whilst preserving the pensioners' entitlements.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the territories in the Commonwealth whose pension obligations towards their former expatriate staff have been taken over by the United Kingdom and those for which similar arrangements have not yet been made; and if he will make a statement on progress made in this respect.

Mr. Raison: The Commonwealth countries whose pension obligations towards certain former expatriate staff have been taken over by the United Kingdom are:

Antigua
Barbados
Belize
Botswana
Cyprus
Dominica
Fiji
Gambia Ghana
Grenada
Guyana
Jamaica
Kenya
Kiribati Lesotho
Malawi
Malaysia
Malta
Mauritius
Nigeria
St. Kitts
St. Lucia
St. Vincent
Seychelles
Sierra Leone
Singapore
Solomon Islands
Sri Lanka
Swaziland
Tanzania
Uganda
Vanuatu
Zambia

Certain pension obligations of the former East African community have also been taken over.

The Commonwealth countries with who similar arrangements have not yet been made are:

(1) Bangladesh: There are roughly 150 eligible pensioners who will be formally taken over when arrangements for the transfer of certain residual Pakistan pensions are complete.
(2) India: Responsibility for the main body of Indian pensions was transferred in 1955; a small residual group of about 200 pensioners remains.
(3) Trinidad: There are approximately 100 eligible pensioners.

We expect to complete arrangements to take over these pensions during the course of this year. Financial settlements consequent upon this takeover programme remain to be concluded with 23 of the countries listed above. We expect this process to be completed within the next two years.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the actuarial valuation of the central African pension fund at the most recent date available; and if he will make a statement as to the Government's policy towards the fund.

Mr. Raison: The interim actuarial valuation of the central African pension fund as at 31 July 1983 showed the following:

	Zimbabwe dollars million
Assets	30·6
Liabilities	27·5
Estimated surplus	3·1

These figures were based on certain assumptions, including exchange rates. A full valuation is in the course of preparation.

The British Government, in common with the three other guarantor Governments — Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe — are concerned to ensure that the fund has sufficient resources to enable it to meet its commitments. In particular, the British Government have undertaken to meet 25 per cent. of any deficit revealed by periodic actuarial valuations of the fund. We have contributed some £4 million since 1964 under this arrangement.

Sub-Saharan Africa

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total value of British bilateral aid to sub-Saharan African countries in 1985; and what proportion of this was used for agriculture and related activities.

Mr. Raison: British bilateral aid directly allocable to sub-Saharan countries in 1985 totalled £285 million. Figures on the proportion of this used for agriculture and related activities are not yet available. In 1984 30 per cent.

of our bilateral aid allocable by sector in sub-Saharan African countries was devoted to agriculture and related activities.

Semi-Arid Tropics (Research)

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution is made by the United Kingdom to the international agricultural research centre for research in the semi-arid tropics; what assessment he makes of the research carried out there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The International Crop Research Institute for the Semi-Arid Tropics (ICRISAT) plays an important part in the attack on the key problems of agricultural development in the semi-arid areas. We particularly welcome its growing focus on African problems. Since its foundation in 1972, Britain has committed a total of £6·777 million to ICRISAT. In 1986-87 our contribution will be £860,000. In addition, we are financing at British institutions sixteen research and development schemes, costing a total of £2·6 million, which support the ICRISAT research programme.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Procurator Fiscal's Service

Mr. Wilson asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many legally qualified staff in the procurator fiscal's service have resigned their posts since January; and what plans he has to replace them.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Since 1 January 1986 seven legally qualified staff have resigned their posts. All have been replaced, or are in the process of being replaced.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Foreign Language Teaching

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now publish his planned policy statement on foreign language teaching in schools.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A new start is needed in foreign language teaching in schools. If we are to compete effectively in world markets and to communicate on equal terms with our European partners, we need to increase substantially the numbers of young people leaving school with a good grounding in at least one foreign language. To this end, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have today published a draft statement of policy on foreign languages in the school curriculum. It sets out a programme of vigorous action which is in our view essential to raise standards. We hope that these policy measures will be matched by a growing appreciation on the part of employers and parents of the value of foreign language skills.

The draft policy statement is being sent for comment to a wide range of organisations in education and in industry and commerce. We intend to issue it substantively before the end of the year. Copies of the draft statement have been placed in the Library.

University Grants Committee

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the background of each member of the University Grants Committee; and if he will list, where appropriate, the university with which they are associated.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

Formerly Headmistress, Girls Comprehensive School, Aberdare, Mid-Glamorgan.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he takes when appointing the University Grants Committee to seek to ensure that its membership is representative of all British universities.

Mr. Walden: There are currently 11 university members of the University Grants Committee, which advises on grants to 54 universities and colleges. Members of the committee are chosen by my right hon. Friend after consultation with the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland and having regard in particular to the need for the committee to be able to cover the main broad university subject areas. They are not appointed in a representative capacity, but because of the personal contribution they can make to the work of the committee.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he makes of the correlation between the availability of caning as a sanction in schools and the conduct of pupils.

Mr. Chris Patten: In my view, this is an assessment which only a school itself can properly make.

Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report his best estimate of the amount spent per head in the United Kingdom by private schools and colleges at each level of education.

Mr. Dunn: Information on which an estimate could be based is not available.

Secondary Schools

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of secondary schools in the United Kingdom are grammar schools; and how this compares with 1979, 1970 and 1960.

Mr. Dunn: Grammar schools represented 3·9 per cent. of maintained secondary schools in England in January 1985. This compares with 5·4, 19·3 and 21·3 per cent. in 1979, 1970 and 1960 respectively. Statistics for schools in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are the responsibility of the Secretaries of State for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

University of Wales

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what effect the implementation of the University Grants Committee's financing recommendations are expected to have on the provision of Welsh-medium teaching in the University of Wales;

(2) what effect the financing recommendations of the University Grants Committee are expected to have on research in each of the colleges of the University of Wales if they are implemented;

(3) what he expects the effects will be in terms of jobs lost, in each of the constituent colleges of the University of Wales if the recommendations of the University Grants Committee are implemented.

Mr. Walden: The effect on the colleges of the University of Wales of the grant allocation for 1986-87 recently announced by the University Grants Committee will depend upon decisions by the colleges on the internal allocation of the resources available to them.

In allocating grant, the UGC took account for each university of research staff and student numbers, contract research income and income from research councils and charitable bodies and its judgment of research quality.

Provision for teaching and administration in the medium of Welsh was taken into account in the calculation of grant for the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, and the University College of North Wales, Bangor.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the effects will be in terms of financing, compared with the previous quinquennium, on the colleges of the University of Wales of the implementation of the University Grants Committee's present recommendations.

Mr. Walden: The percentage changes in real terms in funding of the colleges of the University of Wales by the University Grants Committee over the period 1981-82 to 1986-87 is shown in the following table. The figures represent changes in the colleges' basic recurrent and equipment grant excluding those amounts representing compensation for redundancy and early retirement, provision for capital in recurrent expenditure and local authority rates, which are also reimbursed by the UGC.

University (Funding)

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the change in the funding of universities in real terms and taking account of fee compensation between 1980-81 and 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Between 1980-81 and 1986-87 academic years the universities' income from recurrent grant plus home student fees is estimated to have fallen by about 6 per cent. in real terms. This figure does not reflect the universities' true financial position because of the growth in income from other sources, including the payment of higher fees by overseas students following the withdrawal of the overseas student subsidy.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give, for each year for which statistics are available, and to the latest available date, such information that he has as to (a) the cost of the assisted places scheme, (b) the proportion of successful candidates who were already receiving their schooling in the independent section, or who had brothers and sisters receiving such education, (c) the average income of families who have used the assisted place scheme, and (d) what are the ages of transfer of the pupils who have moved from the state sector using the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn: I will reply as soon as possible.

Teachers (Smoking)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in relation to teachers smoking in classrooms.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for determination at local level, but I understand that most teachers refrain from smoking in the classroom.

School Examinations (Hampshire)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give the number of children in Hampshire who have taken the certificate of secondary education examination in the last five years, indicating the subjects taken;

(2) if he will give the number of children who have taken O-levels in Hampshire and in what subjects; and how many have passed in the last five years;

(3) how many children, expressed as percentage of the total number leaving at 16 years, leave school at 16 (a) with no O-levels or certificate of secondary education, and (b) with no O-levels and certificate of secondary education grades 4 and below.

Mr. Dunn: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Universities (Part-time Courses)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, how many representations he has received in the past 10 days with regard to part-time courses at universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received some two dozen representations about the allocation of funds in relation to part-time students at Birkbeck college. I understand that the University Grants Committee has agreed to review this aspect of its allocation arrangements in the light of points made when the committee visited London university on 11 June and of further information to be provided by Birkbeck college.

Teacher Training

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which cities have a college or similar institution running initial teacher training courses.

Mr. Chris Patten: Institutions currently providing initial teacher training are located in or close to the following cities and towns in England:

GCSE (Syllabuses)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place a set of new General Certificate of Secondary Education syllabuses in the Library.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department does not publish GCSE syllabuses. Each of the examining groups in England is responsible for the production of its own GCSE syllabuses. However, I am arranging for all available syllabuses to be placed in the Library as soon as possible. Further syllabuses will be added as they are approved.

NERC (Funding)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list (a) the institutes, (b) the associations and (c) the research bodies within

ENERGY

New Power Stations

13. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is prepared to consider the introduction of the least cost resource principle to applications for building new power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Minimum cost is already a key factor in the CEGB's decision to apply for my right hon. Friend's consent to construct particular power stations. My right hon. Friend will treat all such applications on their merits.

Nuclear Power

15. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has plans to meet his counterpart in the French Government to discuss nuclear power.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet my French counterpart from time to time in a number of fora where nuclear matters form part of the discussions.

16. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is discussing with Euratom the granting of access to Great Britain's nuclear power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Euratom safeguards inspectors have access to the United Kingdom's civil nuclear power stations to carry out their duties under the Euratom treaty to which the United Kingdom acceded on 1 January 1973.

New Power Stations

18. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the ordering of new coal-fired power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend meets the chairman from time to time and they discuss a wide range of issues. The CEGB has stated that it does not intend to order any more stations, either coal-fired or nuclear, until it receives my right hon. Friend's decision on its application to construct a PWR station at Sizewell.

34. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to introduce a policy of total openness into the nuclear power industry.

Mr. Goodlad: The nuclear industry is already very open, and I am encouraging the maximum possible openness especially with regard to incidents with implications for the safety of the public or the work force.

Magnox Power Stations

19. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the expected timetable of the phasing out of the older Magnox power stations; and when he expects their decommissioning.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the operators that the Magnox power stations continue to meet stringent safety standards. No firm plans for the closure or decommissioning of any stations have yet been made.

38. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether any safety reviews of Magnox power stations have been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate makes it a condition of nuclear site licences that all reactors must be shut down every two years for maintenance and inspection. A reactor is not permitted to start up again until the NII is satisfied that it is safe for it to do so. In addition, the inspectorate requires licensees to carry out a general safety review of Magnox power station following 20 years of operation to enable longer term safety issues to be addressed.

The NII completed work in March 1983 on its assessment of BNFL's long term safety reviews for Calder Hall and Chapel Cross with the exception of a few issues which require further assessment and discussion.

Combined Heat and Power

20. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made on the lead city schemes for combined heat and power; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer to the answer I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet).

43. Mr. Peter Brüinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the jobs created and money to be saved in the first five years of combined heat and power in (a) Leicester, (b) Newcastle and (c) Edinburgh.

Mr. David Hunt: Estimates in Energy Paper No. 53 indicate that additional local employment of some 3,000 jobs might result over a 12 to 15 year period from installing the heat distribution systems and consumer connections in all nine cities studied. Leicester would account for approximately 175 extra jobs with some 300 extra jobs in both Newcastle and Edinburgh over the same timescale. Other employment would arise from the construction of new CHP plant and heat only boiler plant. A more precise estimate of employment prospects arising from CHP/DH schemes must await the outcome of the studies presently under way in those cities.

Energy Paper No. 53 estimated the overall rates of return for each of the nine cities studied on an assumed 35-year life for all schemes. During the first five years of a CHP/DH development the cumulative cash flow may be negative as expenditure on plant and construction is likely to exceed income from sales. Again, more precise estimates must await the outcome of current studies.

Energy Efficiency

21. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the potential savings in energy which can be obtained from improving the energy efficiency of commercial and industrial buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: As I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) today, improved energy efficiency in industrial and commercial buildings alone could save £800 million a year. Office buildings with poor energy efficiency are using four times as much fuel as similar well-managed buildings. It is essential that we put an end to this scandalous waste.

Oil Production

22. Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the value of United Kingdom oil production for each of the first four months of 1986.

Mr. Peter Walker: This information is available only on a quarterly basis. The provisional figure for the first quarter of 1986 is £3·6 billion.

41. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Energy if the fall in oil prices has affected production in the North sea.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The fall in oil prices has not had any measurable effect on oil production in the North sea. Even at today's level the price is still substantially above the ongoing costs incurred in producing oil from existing fields. The latest forecast of oil production was given in the Secretary of State's recent report to Parliament on the development of the oil and gas resources of the United Kingdom 1986, published on 29 April.

47. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the effects of lower oil prices on North sea oil production.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I have today given to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham).

Electricity Supply (Fuel Costs)

23. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the saving to date to the electricity supply industry in fuel costs arising from the recent fall in the cost of oil.

Mr. Goodlad: The cost of fuel used in the first two months of the present financial year is estimated by the CEGB at about £60 million less than envisaged when the bulk supply tariff for the year was drawn up.

Energy Costs

24. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration he is giving to the impact of the level of energy costs borne by industry in the United Kingdom, compared with those of other Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development countries in the past 12 months.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to him on this subject on 14 April this year at column 260. Energy prices in this country, as elsewhere, have continued to fall in response to world market conditions. For example, the recent conclusion of a commercial agreement with the coal industry has allowed the electricity supply industry to announce immediate reductions in electricity prices to monthly-billed industrial consumers of about 5 per cent., and of about 7 to 8 per cent. for larger consumers with load management arrangements. There have also been downward movements in gas prices to industry, reflecting competitive pressures from oil products.

Gas and Electricity (Standing Charges)

25. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received in the current year for the reform or abolition of standing charges on fuel bills.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received some representations this year on these issues, which are matters for the industries concerned. This and previous Governments, the industries' consumers' councils and the Council of the European Communities have shared the view that standing charges are the fairest and most appropriate way of recovering the fixed costs of supply. Standing charges for gas have decreased by 10 per cent. since 1982, a fall of around 24 per cent. in real terms; and those for electricity have risen by only 8 per cent. over that period, a fall of around 10 per cent. in real terms.

Oil-fired Power Stations

26. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Energy what increase in fuel consumption has occurred in oil-fired power stations in the past three months.

Mr. Goodlad: Figures for fuel used in the generation of electricity over the past three months will appear in future editions of "Energy Trends', which is published monthly.

Plutonium

27. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the transfer of electricity board plutonium to the military stockpile.

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Sizewell

28. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received requesting a delay in the eventual consideration of the report from the inspector considering the Central Electricity Generating Board's application for a pressurised water reactor at Sizewell, pending a full analysis of the implications of the Chernobyl disaster.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend has received many and varied representations since the Chernobyl incident.

Neighbourhood Energy Action

29. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assistance his Department is giving to neighbourhood energy action; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department's grant to neighbourhood energy action for 1986-87 is £275,000. This compares with a grant of £186,764 in 1985-86. The increase is to enable NEA to expand the services that it provides to the voluntary insulation projects. The number of projects has increased from 114 in March last year to over 260 in May this year, and is expected to increase further to about 400 by the end of this year. NEA provides management advice, information and training to the projects. I regard NEA's services as a major contribution to the success achieved by the projects in insulating over 170,000 low-income households to date.

Coal Industry

30. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the productivity figures, expressed in output per manshift, for the coal industry in 1979 and at the latest available date.

46. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest productivity figures in the coal industry.

Mr. David Hunt: Overall deep-mined revenue output per man shift for the week ending 24 May was 3·16 tonnes. This compares with average deep-mined revenue output per man shift in the financial year 1979-80 of 2·31 tonnes.

33. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the total value of grants made by the Government to the coal industry since 1979.

36. Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the extent of Government financial support for the coal industry.

44. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the extent of the Government's support for the coal industry in 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Walker: The total amount of deficit grant—including operating grant—and social grant accruing to British Coal in the financial years 1979-80 to 1984-85 is £5,162 million. In addition, payments under the Redundant Mineworkers' Payments Scheme during the period total £555 million. Provisional figures for 1985-86 are as follows:

	£ million
Deficit Grant	50
Social Grant	508
RMPS	567

Coal Prices

31. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss coal prices.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Coal at regular intervals to discuss all aspects of the industry, including coal prices.

Monergy

32. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many information packs on Monergy have been issued by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Over 140,000 information packs on Monergy have been issued by my Department so far during Energy Efficiency Year. In addition, some 2 million domestic and 400,000 industry publications have been distributed at seminars, exhibitions or sent out to meet requests from the public and industry.

Power Stations (Coal)

35. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will consider sponsoring additional research into improving the efficiency and environmental acceptability of coal as power station fuel.

Mr. David Hunt: The nationalised energy industries are already spending more than £40 million per year on research and development on clean use of coal in power generation. We believe this is the right level of effort.

Oil Prices

37. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he is having with the Norwegian Government on oil prices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: None.

British Coal

39. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of British Coal concerning the results of the boring explorations off the north-east coast.

Mr. David Hunt: The chairman of British Coal has kept me informed about the boring explorations off the north-east coast, and I expect to discuss the results with him from time to time as the board's plans develop.

45. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of British Coal at regular intervals to discuss a wide variety of issues concerning the coal industry.

National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd.

40. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the progress made by the National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd.

Mr. David Hunt: I am very impressed by the progress being made by NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. Since its formation in October 1984 up to the end of May 1986 the company had contributed to a total of 7,200 job opportunities. A total of £11·4 million of NCB (Enterprise) funds has been committed, generating a total investment of £70 million. NCB (Enterprise) Ltd's target for 1986-87 is to double its activities nationally by helping in the creation of 10,000 new job opportunities.

49. Mr. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy when the National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd. intends to produce its corporate plan.

Mr. David Hunt: The company's annual review was published on 5 June. I have placed a copy in the Library of the House.

Chernobyl Incident

42. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he proposes to seek any detailed information from the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the role of the civil protection authorities in the Chernobyl disaster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: All the members of the IAEA, including the United Kingdom, have indicated their interest in having the fullest possible account of the origins and handling of the Chernobyl accident. The USSR has expressed its willingness to provide, as soon as it is available, information on the incident, to be discussed at a meeting of nuclear safety experts to be held under the aegis of the IAEA.

British Gas

48. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy when the prospectus for the privatisation of British Gas will be published.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The prospectus will be published shortly before the application list for shares in British Gas is opened.

Geothermal Project (Cornwall)

50. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of Cornwall's geothermal project.

Mr. David Hunt: The project being carried out by the Camborne School of Mines at Rosemanowes quarry in Cornwall has been extended for a further two years starting in October 1986 at a cost of £5·85 million and will include work on the existing hot dry rock reservoir, measurement techniques, geophysics and heat flow. Other related work will cost a further £1 million.

Alternative Energy

51. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list Government expenditure on alternative energy over the past five years compared with the previous five years; and if he will make a statement on Government policy and expenditure plans for alternative energy.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have invested more than £81 million in R and D into renewable energy sources since 1979, and we have just announced fresh funding of £6·85 million for the hot dry rocks project based in Cornwall. Among other projects we are also funding development of the world's largest and most advanced aerogenerator, at Burgar Hill, Orkney.

This clearly shows the Government's determination to develop and promote all the economic renewable energy technologies which have the potential to contribute to United Kingdom energy supply.

Government expenditure on this programme was £14 million in 1984-85, and this strong support for renewable R and D will continue. We will also continue to encourage an increasing contribution from the private industry.

Details of expenditure over the past 10 years, comparing the past five years with the previous five years, are as follows:

	£ million
1980-81	11·2
1981-82	17·3
1982-83	14·2
1983-84	11·3
1984-85	14·0
Total	68·0

	£ million
1975-76	*0·5
1976-77	*1·0
1977-78	*2·5
1978-79	3·6
1979-80	8·2
Total	15·8

ENVIRONMENT

Town and Country Planning Use Classes Order

Mr. Macfarlane asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to complete his consultation round with appropriate authorities over the Town and Country Planning Use Classes Order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey [pursuant to his reply, 15 April, 1986, c. 337]: We are grateful to all those who commented on the proposals for the revision of the order which were made by the sub-group of the Property Advisory Group. We are publishing today a consultation paper which sets out our own proposals for the modernisation of the order, it takes full account of all the views expressed to us.

Modernising the order will reduce the need for planning applications, but retain effective control over changes of use where that is needed, because of their environmental consequences or relationship with other uses.

The major changes by which we propose to modernise the order will allow more flexible use of business premises. For example, they would create a new business class by merging the present light industrial use class with office uses other than those which provide professional and financial services to customers who visit the premises; this will help commercial and industrial activities which at present straddle the boundary between two classes. In addition we propose to amend the Housing and Planning Bill to make it clear that sub-division of non-domestic premises does not constitute a change of use and does not require planning permission. These changes will give greater freedom to industry to undertake development and create jobs without endangering amenity.

We consider that we should keep the existing shops class and add to it certain similar uses which are at present excluded. We propose, however, to create two new classes, one would consist of shops selling hot food, restaurants, snack bars, cafes, public houses and similar establishments; the other would be for financial and professional services offered direct to the public visiting the premises. We propose to amend the General Development Order, to make it possible to shift use from either of these two new classes to the expanded shops class without getting specific planning permission. But permission would still be needed for shifting use in the other direction. This would enable local planning authorities to continue to protect the character of existing shopping areas.

We have already clarified the quite wide circumstances in which under the present law people can work at home without any need to seek specific planning permission from the local planning authority. Guidance on this is given in our publication "A Step by Step Guide to Planning Permission for Small Businesses" published in March this year. We do not propose to make any amendment to the use classes order on this point.

Full details of the proposals to modernise the order are in the consultation paper published today. Copies have been placed in the Library. Copies are also being sent today to the local authority associations and other interested bodies with the request that they should send to the Department by 15 September any comments which they may have on the proposals.

Home Insulation Grants

76. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the demand for home insulation grant schemes in the current year; and if he will make a statement on the future of the scheme.

Sir George Young: The available information on the number of homes insulation scheme grants paid so far in the current year is for the first quarter of 1986, is provisional, and will be published in July in "Housing and Construction Statistics," part 2, no. 25. Copies of the publication will be available in the Library.

The scheme is kept under continuing review, but there are no plans at present to change it.

Gases (Climatic Change)

77. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much have the Government increased their spending in response to the recommendations of the joint UNEP/WMO/ICSU conference, convened in Villach, Austria, in October 1985, to assess the role of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases in climatic changes, that governments and funding agencies should increase research support and focus efforts on crucial unsolved problems related to greenhouse gases and climate change; and what changes in Her Majesty's Government's policy has occurred in consequence of the conclusions and recommendations of the conference.

Mrs. Rumbold: The main United Kingdom centre of expertise on the problem of effects of greenhouse gases on climate is the Meteorological Office, which has paid increasing attention to it in recent years. Research on these subjects formed a part of the office's total programme of £7·7 million in 1984-85, but cannot be costed separately. The office is participating actively in the world climate research programme and other relevant international activities.

My Department keeps in close touch with scientific opinion on the problem of greenhouse gases and climate change, and policy is subject to constant review.

The stratospheric ozone review group established by my Department is expected to report on the problem early next year.

Agricultural Land (Development)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of agricultural land have been lost to development during the most recent year for which records are available; and what percentage of those acres lie south of the line between the centres of Bristol and London.

Mrs. Rumbold: Estimates of land transferred from agriculture to development are currently based on the MAFF agricultural census and are considered to be reliable as a five year average. The most recent estimate for the period from mid-1980 to mid-1985 for England is that about 4,400 hectares, equivalent to about 11,000 acres, was transferred from agriculture annually. No reliable estimate is possible for smaller areas.

A new source of information on changes in land use has been developed, using information recorded by the Ordnance Survey in the course of map revision on the new and previous use of land. Returns for 1985 are currently being analysed, and statistics based on them are expected to be published shortly. I will write to my right hon. Friend further when this material is available.

Local Authorities (Land)

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation providing a right of appeal against any grant of planning permission by local authorities over land they own.

Mrs. Rumbold: No. We consider that the present arrangements for decisions on this type of development proposal operate satisfactorily.

Homeless Families

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homeless families were recorded in each of the district authorities in West Yorkshire for each quarter since 1983.

Sir George Young: Information on homelessness in each local authority is published regularly in Local Housing Statistics, copies of which are available in the Library. For 1983 and 1984 the figures published are half yearly and for 1985 they are quarterly.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, following the recent visit to the military nuclear facility at Barnwell in South Carolina by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) he will publish a comparative table of the volumes of low-level nuclear waste handled at Barnwell and at Drigg, and the access available at each site for low-level nuclear waste disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: British Nuclear Fuels accepts low-level radioactive waste for disposal at Drigg from its own establishments, nuclear power stations and premises such as hospitals, universities and non-nuclear industry. The volumes of waste disposed of are published in BNFL's annual report of radioactive discharges and monitoring of the environment. In 1984, 33,149 cubic metres were deposited at the site. The Barnwell waste disposal site accepts approximately 28,000 cubic metres of low-level radioactive waste per year from sources in the South East of the United States. It is not a military site, but is operated by Chem Nuclear Systems Inc, under licences named by the state of South Carolina.

Radiation

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of radiation detectors available in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Rumbold: About 7,000.

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he will take to ensure comprehensive advice is available to the population on what to do if the level of radiation rises above an acceptable level.

Mrs. Rumbold: Notification to members of the public immediately affected by an accident at a United Kingdom nuclear site would be made by the police under the arrangements described in the booklet "Emergency Plans for Civil Nuclear Installations", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. In the event of the levels of radiation giving cause for concern over a wide area an announcement would be made as soon as possible via the media and a press, radio and television briefing centre would be set up to provide advice for the public.

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the maximum level of radiation measured in the United Kingdom, and its location, in the aftermath of the Chernobyl disaster.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to a question by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) on 9 May at column 304.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers' meeting on 12 June.

Mr. Waldegrave: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting. I was accompanied by my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment and my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department.

The Council agreed amendments to the major accident hazards directive (82/501/EEC) and to the decision (77/795/EEC) for a Community water information system, and reached general agreement on all the main points arising from a proposal for a directive on animal experimentation. The Council also discussed the sulphur content of gas oil, waste oils, and emissions from large combustion plants. The Commission briefly outlined its forthcoming proposals for diesel particulates and heavy vehicles.

The Council discussed the accident at the nuclear plant at Chernobyl and expressed its concern for all those affected. It concluded that there was a need for improved international communication and co-operation in relation to all aspects of civil nuclear power.

Refuse Disposal

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by local authority and for all England (a) the number of people employed in refuse collection in 1979-80 and the most recent available year and (b) the number of people employed in street cleansing in 1979-80 and the most recent available year.

Mrs. Rumbold: Numbers of staff employed by English local authorities on refuse collection and disposal are given below. Information for individual authorities could only be given at disproportionate cost. Information concerning numbers of staff employed in street cleansing is not available centrally.

Local authority staff employed in refuse collection and disposal (England)

	June 1979	June 1985
Full-time	47,602	37,800
Part-time	208	220
Total Numbers (FT and PT)	47,810	38,020
Full-time Equivalent	47,722	37,898

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by local authority and for all England (a) the most recent and penultimate grant-related expenditure assessment for refuse collection and the percentage change and (b) the most recent and penultimate grant-related expenditure assessment for street cleansing and the percentage change.

Mrs. Rumbold: Grant-related expenditure assessments for refuse collection in 1985-86 and 1986-87 are shown in the table. There is no separate assessment for street cleansing, which, for grant related expenditure purposes, is treated as part of environmental health.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how much money was spent (a) in total and (b) per month on refuse disposal in London during the 12 months prior to the abolition of the Greater London Council, as to how much money has been spent (i) in total and (ii) per month on refuse disposal in London during April and May, and as to how much money is expected to be spent on refuse disposal in London (1) in total and (2) per month in the next 10 months.

Mrs. Rumbold: A budget for total revenue expenditure by the Greater London Council in 1985-86 on waste disposal of £72,090,000 was quoted in the submission of the Association of London Authorities on the future organisation of waste disposal in London. An estimate of £72·91 million for revenue expenditure in 1985-86 on this service was contained in another document circulated by the Greater London Council. Otherwise my Department does not have this information.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how much money was spent (a) in total and (b) per month on refuse disposal in Tyne and Wear, Merseyside, West Midlands, South and West Yorkshire and Greater Manchester metropolitan counties during the 12 months prior to their abolition, as to how much money has been spent (i) in total and (ii) per month on refuse disposal in these areas during April and May, and as to how much money is expected to be spent on refuse disposal (1) in total and (2) per month in the next 10 months.

Mrs. Rumbold: The revenue expenditure and income estimates for 1985-86 for Greater Manchester, South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear, West Midlands and West Yorkshire county councils are summarised on pages 13 and 14 of "Waste Disposal Statistics 1985-86 Estimates", published by the statistics information service of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. Merseyside county council (which did not co-operate in this publication) returned a figure of £5·5 million at November 1984 prices to my Department as its net revenue expenditure in 1985-86 on waste disposal. Otherwise my Department does not have this information.

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the report of the review team on the future of the Crown Suppliers, with particlar reference to the possible privatisation of the organisation; what view was expressed to the review team on this matter by suppliers; what conclusions the review team reached about the effect of privatisation on the promptness of bill payments by the Crown Suppliers; what conclusions he has reached on the report's recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: In relation to the report of the review team I have nothing at present to add to the reply I gave on 3 June to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) at columns 510-11. As regards the views expressed by suppliers, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on 27 March at column 625. In its report, the review team notes that some suppliers expressed concern that the Crown Suppliers, if privatised, might not pay bills as promptly as at present.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the importance for small businesses of contracts from the Crown Suppliers.

Sir George Young: The Government attach great importance to the encouragement and use of small firms on contracts for the Crown Suppliers. In line with Government policy, the Crown Suppliers places contracts wherever possible with small businesses, where this can be shown to be economic. About one third of all contracts awarded after competition in 1984-85 were with firms employing fewer than 100 staff.

Paper

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what percentage of paper used by Government Departments for correspondence with other Departments and Members of Parliament is recycled;

(2) what steps he is taking to encourage Government Departments to use 100 per cent. recycled paper for their correspondence;

(3) what is the estimated amount of paper used by his Department each year for correspondence; what is the total cost; and what is the difference in cost between recycled and non-recycled paper.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Secretary of State has asked other Government Departments to consider using recycled paper, but it is for individual Departments to determine whether it would be economic and practical to do so. Details of this usage are not kept by my Department.

Within my Department, existing stocks of conventional paper are now being used up. Thereafter all correspondence with be conducted on recycled paper. My Department uses 15 tonnes of paper each year for correspondence at an estimated cost of £14,600. Paper costs vary considerably in relation to quality but my Department expects an estimated annual saving of £4,000 through the use of recycled paper.

Water

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions he has with the European Commission as to the extent to which the proposed water services plcs will be accepted as competent authorities for the purpose of the relevant EEC directives; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many homes had their own water supplies cut off by water authorities in 1985; and for how long, in each year from 1979 to 1986 and to the latest available date.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Greater London Council (Minutes)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the reason for the delay in circulating the draft minutes of the last meeting of the Greater London council held on 27 March.

Mrs. Rumbold: This is a matter for the London residuary body. I understand that it expects to issue the minutes shortly.

Playboard

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Playboard has received in Government funds in the last year.

Mrs. Rumbold: The amount is £700,000 in the financial year 1985-86.

Palace Chambers

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what work he intends to carry out on Palace Chambers; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: For some time Palace Chambers, which forms part of the Bridge street redevelopment site, has been scheduled for eventual demolition. Following advice from structural engineers, it was decided in January that early demolition was necessary to relieve the load on the supporting structure. Some preliminary work has already been done. Work will start this month to take the building down to first-floor level which will enable the ground floor shops to remain open until later in the year when their leases expire. The rest of the building will then be demolished.

The work has been arranged in close consultation with London Underground.

Plans for the new building are at an early stage.

Area Caretaker

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why his Department has turned down new area caretaker projects in Handsworth, Birmingham.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the total amount of capital receipts which (a) all local authorities, (b) local authorities in the northern region and (c) the borough of Sunderland are currently prevented from spending because of the regulations regarding such spending which prevail at present.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 3 June 1986, c. 495]: Under the present capital control arrangements local authorities can spend all their capital receipts over time. Receipts can be used to repay debt or to finance capital expenditure in lieu of borrowing at any time. But the amount which can be used in any one year to justify extra capital expenditure in addition to allocations is limited by the relevant prescribed proportions.

Information on the accumulated capital receipts of individual local authorities is only available for 1984-85. At the end of that year local authorities in England held accumulated receipts of £6·2 billion. Of that total, £3·8 billion was backed by cash; the remainder had been used for purposes such as debt repayment. The prescribed proportion of the accumulated receipts available to justify additional capital expenditure in 1985-86 was £1·7 billion.

The equivalent figures for local authorities in the northern region and for the borough of Sunderland were as follows:

£ million

	Northern Region	Sunderland Borough Council
Accumulated receipts at the end of 1984-85	327	26
Cash backed accumulated receipts at end of 1984-85	182	9
Prescribed proportion of accumulated receipts available in 1985-86	83	6

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has received from the London Docklands Development Corporation concerning major new road construction in its area; and what are the estimated costs of each section of the proposed works.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 19]: The London Docklands Development Corporation has put forward proposals for a new highways strategy, many parts of which are still under discussion. The proposals fall broadly into three groups, with these preliminary estimates of cost:

a. an east-west route from Butcher Row to Silvertown Way—about £115 million;
b. a continuation of that route from Silvertown Way to the future A13/South Woodford to Barking Relief Road Junction — about £65 million;
c. various improvements in Southwark costing about £11 million.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what guidance he is giving to the London residuary body in respect of transfers from the Greater London council mortgage account to private sector companies;

(2) if he has given any guidance to the London residuary body in respect of the disposal or future use of county hall.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 12 June 1986, c. 310]: A draft of guidance on property, rights and liabilities to all residuary bodies was circulated on 10 April 1986 to local authority associations, successor authorities and residuary bodies for comment. The draft did not include specific guidance about the Greater London Council's mortgage account or about County Hall in London. The draft guidance is being reviewed in the light of the comments received.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will itemise the subjects covered by instructions, directives and guidance issued by his Department to each residuary body since the abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 12 June 1986, c. 310]: No instructions or guidance in final form have been issued to residuary bodies since 1 April 1986 and no directions have been made under section 65 of the Local Government Act 1985. A draft of guidance on property, rights and liabilities to all residuary bodies was circulated to local authority associations, successor authorities and residuary bodies for comment. The draft guidance is being reviewed in the light of the comments received.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his current estimate of the number of ex-Greater London council staff who have not still received full payment of outstanding moneys from the London residuary body.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 12 June 1986, c. 310]: It is not possible to give a precise estimate. This is partly because some redundancy or compensation payments may be subject to adjustment in the light of late changes in an individual's emoluments immediately before abolition, partly because some claims are in dispute, and partly because claims for compensation for financial detriment, which will be made on a continuing basis for a period of eight years, are still being received and because such payments will also be subject to adjustment in the light of any change in the circumstances of those eligible.

Coal Industry (Disabled Persons)

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the extent of compliance by the National Coal Board with the quota requirement for the employment of disabled persons under the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944; and if he will give the employment percentage for each region, district and colliery.

Mr. David Hunt: I shall ask the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Electricity Generation (Costs)

Mr. Wigley asked the secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a table indicating on the most recent available information, including the newly negotiated contract for the supply of coal to the Central Electricity Generating Board, what are the comparative costs of generating electricity by nuclear power and by the various conventional methods of generation.

Mr. Goodlad: I will ask the chairman of the CEGB to write to the hon. Member.

British Gas

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what companies are involved in giving advice on, or in the promotion of, the sale of the British Gas Corporation; and what functions they are performing.

PRIME MINISTER

Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Alexander asked the Prime Minister if, in order to bring together under common management within the Department of the Environment responsibility for air, waste and water inspection, she will arrange for responsibility for the industrial air pollution inspectorate to be transferred to that Department.

The Prime Minister: The working arrangements in this and related areas are currently under review.

Birmingham City Council (Ministerial Deputations)

Mr. Rooker asked the Prime Minister if she will list the Ministers who have received deputations from Birmingham city council in the current year, stating the dates and the purpose of each meeting.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Visiting Dignitaries (Official Gifts)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister how much was spent by her office on official gifts for visiting dignitaries and for presentation by her in each year since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Information in the form requested, or before 1 April 1983, is not available except at disproportionate cost.

Since 1 April 1983, the following amounts have been spent on gifts for presentation, including those bought for presentation during overseas visits:

Financial year	Amount £
1983-84	14,450
1984-85	16,678
1985-86	21,524

Community Psychiatric Centres

Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister, further to her reply of 12 June, whether any Minister other than those at the Department of Health and Social Security have had any contact with representatives of community psychiatric centres about their proposal to build and run a psychiatric hospital catering for National Health Service patients in Birmingham; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of any such contacts.

HOME DEPARTMENT

News International

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have been seconded from Leyton and Leytonstone to assist in the policing of the industrial dispute at Wapping.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Officers deployed at various times at the News International plant at Wapping have been drawn from throughout the Metropolitan police district. I understand from the commissioner that while the information sought is not readily available in the form requested, officers from Leyton and Leytonstone police stations have performed duty at Wapping for 1,040 hours and 408 hours respectively.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been to date (a) the cost to public funds of the police operation outside Mr. Rupert Murdoch's establishment at Wapping, (b) the proportion of total Metropolitan police manpower engaged in these operations, (c) the proportion of total Metropolitan police time taken up by these operations, (d) the effect of these operations on other Metropolitan police operations and (e) which anti-crime activities have specifically been affected.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the police have entered the Wapping premises of News International during the course of the current dispute.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the commissioner that on occasions the police have entered the premises of News International in connection with the prevention or detection of criminal offences.

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests have taken place at Wapping in connection with the print dispute from 18 May to 16 June.

Mr. Giles Shaw: One hundred and three, up to midnight on 15 June.

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost of policing the demonstrations and pickets at the Wapping News International plant.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total policing costs to date of the News International dispute at Wapping.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his replies, 8 May, c. 207, and 20 May, c. 126]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the additional costs incurred in policing the News International dispute at Wapping up to 10 May are estimated at some £550,000.

Prison Visits (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the total cost of financial assistance to relatives from elsewhere in the United Kingdom visiting prisoners in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mellor: It would not be possible except at disproportionate cost to disaggregate expenditure on assisted visits by reference to the destination of visitors.

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the total cost of the financial assistance scheme for relatives visiting prisoners in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mellor: Provisional outturn for 1985-86 for expenditure on the assisted visits schemes is as follows:

England and Wales	*818,283
Scotland	*160,102
Northern Ireland	42,394
Total	*1,020,779

*These figures include expenditure incurred by the Department of Health and Social Security in 1984-85 but not reimbursed until 1985-86.

Representation of the People Act 1985

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to issue a commencement order under the Representation of the People Act 1985; and to which electoral register he expects the new provisions for absent voters to relate.

Mr. Mellor: We intend to make a further commencement order under the Representation of the People Act 1985 as soon as the draft Representation of the People Regulations 1986, which are now before Parliament, have been approved. We expect the new provisions on absent voting to come into force on 1 January next year for the purpose of any election falling on or after 16 February 1987, the date when the next electoral register comes into force.

Schools (Information and Careers Visits)

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police and prison service personnel are currently involved in information and careers visits to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police officers visit schools to give advice on a variety of matters but there is no central record of the number of officers involved. Visits to schools are not normally made by members of the prison service for this purpose.

Terminally Ill Prisoners

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when officials in the criminal department dealing with cases of terminally ill prisoners were reminded orally by their line managers of the need to take particular and urgent care in the consideration of such prisoners;

(2) when officials in the criminal department dealing with cases of terminally ill prisoners were reminded in writing by their line managers of the need to take particular and urgent care in the consideration of such prisoners; and whether he will supply a copy of the letter concerned to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West;

(3) further to his answer of 4 June to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West, by whom officials dealing with the review of decisions on special revision were instructed that no undue delay was to be allowed to occur in reviewing cases; how such instruction was given, and when; and if he will supply a copy of such instructions to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West.

Mr. Mellor: Officials who deal with these cases have always been fully aware of the need to treat them with compassion and urgency. From time to time they are reminded of this orally by their line managers in work discussions and in connection with the consideration of individual cases. In addition, specific reminders about the handling of these cases were issued on 20 December 1985 and 30 May 1986. We do not think it right to make available internal minutes of this kind.

Shoplifting

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now send a further circular to chief officers of police to draw particular attention to the suitability of cautioning in respect of juveniles, the elderly and infirm and persons suffering from physical and mental illness, mental impairment or emotional distress, before instituting procedures for shoplifting.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Home Office circular 14/1985 draws the attention of the police to the suitability of cautioning offenders who are juveniles, elderly or infirm, of suffering from physical or mental illness, mental impairment, or emotional distress in any case where the circumstances of the offence are not particularly serious. The police will have regard to these factors in cases of shoplifting as well as in other offences. The decision on whether to caution or institute a prosecution in individual cases is a matter for chief officers of police, having regard to all the circumstances of the offence.

Mr. Peter Harvey

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of Tuesday 3 June, Official Report, column 520, on what items of legislation Mr. Peter Harvey worked while employed in his Department.

Mr. Hurd: There is no central record of all the legislation Mr. Harvey has worked on since he joined the Home Office in 1948.

Multicultural Centres

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much funding under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1986 is made available to the Avon multicultural centre; how much is provided for similar centres and if he will list them; how much is provided for other educational purposes and if he will categorise them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: For the financial year 1984-85, the last year for which the relevant information is available, the Home Office has approved a claim from Avon county council for a grant under section 11 totalling £703,215 in respect of staff employed at the Avon multicultural education centre. For the same year, it is estimated that total claims for section 11 grant from local education authorities in England and Wales will amount to approximately £60·3 million. Of this, approximately £55 million will be payment in respect of teachers, approximately £4·8 million payment in respect of ancillary helpers and approximately £0·46 million payment in respect of education and welfare officers. These totals include grant claimed by a number of local education authorities in respect of staff working from central units as distinct from schools. These have a variety of titles and functions so that it is difficult to compare them with the Avon centre. However, the available information in respect of these central units is as follows.

Education authority	Name of central unit	Grant claimed in 1984-85 £
Birmingham	Bordesley Centre (including multicultural resource and support units)	1,554,060
Brent	Language Centre	876,578
Buckinghamshire	Multicultural Centre	17,027
Cambridgeshire	Cambridge Multicultural Unit	96,686
	Peterborough Multicultural Education Centre	75,945
Coventry	Minazitj Group Support Service	561,867
Derbyshire	Multicultural Education Centre	90,441
Ealing	Multicultural Support Service and Section	1,029,097
Haringey	English Language Research Centre	469,225
Oldham	Multicultural education and language Service	227,300
Sandwell	Ethnic Minorities Support Service	834,556
Tameside	Multicultural Education Support Section	77,048
Total		5,909,830

Following discussion with representatives of the local education authority about the work of the Avon centre, the Home Office has asked for further information about the functions of certain posts. In the light of this information, which is awaited, we will determine whether these functions can properly be supported by grant under section 11.

Hippy Convoy

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, taking account of the experience of the police in dealing with the unroadworthy vehicles belonging to members of the hippy convoy, he now intends to instruct the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to take similar action against unroadworthy vehicles in London; and if he will call for reports from all chief constables on the action they are taking on this matter.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The enforcement of road traffic legislation is an operational matter for individual chief officers of police.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Hampshire about the total cost to provide funds for the police operation to disperse the hippy convoy.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, and I will reply as soon as possible.

Prisons

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his reply of 10 June, Official Report, column 138, if he will give an indication as to when construction work on the main scheme for the extension of Leeds prison is expected to start.

Mr. Mellor: Early in 1989.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he proposes to cure the problem of overcrowding in prisons.

Mr. Mellor: For the short term we are continuing to look at ways in which better use can be made of the existing prison estate, having regard to changes that have occurred and are projected to occur in the nature of the prison population.

In the longer term, the building programme includes a total of 16 new prisons which will provide some 8,000 additional places by the early 1990s. Three of these prisons have already been completed, five are being built and the remainder are at various stages of planning and design. Apart from the new prisons, there are some 25 major capital projects at existing establishments and also many other smaller schemes. These projects will provide a further 5,500 or so places over the next few years.

We have also acquired and converted for prison purposes a former RAF camp at Lindholme near Doncaster. This has provided a further 750 places with scope for further expansion if necessary.

We are also continuing to encourage the use of non-custodial sentences for persons convicted of less serious offences.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Public Accounts Committee's report on government expenditure for the prison building programme.

Mr. Hurd: The Committee of Public Accounts published its report on the prison building programme on 11 June. It followed a report published in December 1985 by the Comptroller and Auditor General on which the accounting officers of the Home Office and the Property Services Agency were examined in February.

My Department is considering the conclusions and recommendations of the report and, in accordance with the normal practice, the Government's response will be made in a Treasury minute, which we expect to be published before the summer recess. I do not wish to pre-empt that response except to say that we are studying the Committee's criticisms of past performance and welcome its recognition of the progress we have already made, in conjunction with the Property Services Agency and the Lord Chancellor's Department, to improve our procedures for planning, designing and building new prison accommodation.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to deal with difficulties in relation to sanitation in prison cells.

Mr. Mellor: There are approximately 41,200 certified places in prison establishments, including some temporarily out of use for refurbishment, of which approximately 19,400 have either integral sanitation or access to sanitary facilities. Population exceeded certified accommodation by an average of approximately 5,000 during 1985, and most of this surplus population was held in accommodation without access to sanitation. By the end of 1990 we estimate that 28,000 places will have access to sanitation and by 1999 this figure should rise to 37,800; this represents a significant investment in the provision of sanitary facilities.

Various operational and technical problems are involved in providing integral sanitation. In particular, it is necessary to empty substantial blocks of accommodation while the work is undertaken, and this causes operational difficulties in the overcrowded Victorian prisons which are most likely to lack sanitary facilities. It is expected that this problem will ease as the prison building programme progresses and provides extra places to relieve overcrowding in local prisons, but there is a basic conflict between engaging on projects to provide sanitation and achieving our prime objective of reducing overcrowding.

Progress has nevertheless been made. A recent pilot project at Stafford prison has proved successful, and the same system — in which one in every three cells is converted into two sanitary annexes, one for each of the two neighbouring cells — is being used for the refurbishment of Liverpool prison. All new prisons and new accommodation blocks in existing prisons provide for access to sanitation, and it is our policy that access to sanitation should form part of all major refurbishment projects at existing establishments which entail modernisation of the living blocks.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he proposes to reduce the number of prison buildings which remain unused due to faults in their design.

Mr. Mellor: The only new prison accommodation that remains part unoccupied is at Holloway. Plans are in hand to bring this into use, but these are dependent on the implementation of recommendations which have recently been made by a manpower appraisal team. The need for a manpower study was recommended in the Holloway project committee report, July 1985.

Police (Civil Actions)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the questions from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West about civil actions against the police for which replies were promised on 14 April, Official Report, column 235, and about which telephone calls were made to his Department on 1 May, 23 May, 5 June and 10 June.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have today written to the hon. Member. I regret the delay in replying.

Prevention of Terrorism

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were arrested or detained in each police authority area for each month since July 1985 under the Prevention of Terrorism Act; what was the length of time each person was held; with what offences they were charged; and how many were served with exclusion orders.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Birmingham Bombings

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department's review of the case of the six people currently serving sentences for the Birmingham bombings has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend has been considering the material submitted to him following the "World in Action" programme on 28 October last year. He has now received a copy of a book about the case, which is to be published shortly. My right hon. Friend will need to consider whether it provides any further material or evidence which would affect his decision on whether or not he would be justified in referring the case to the Court of Appeal.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Frank Field asked the Paymaster General if he will specify the average unemployment rate during 1984 and 1985 in each of the 10 local authority areas with the highest average unemployment rates in the United Kingdom for the years specified.

Mr. Lang: The following table shows, for 1984 and 1985, the 10 counties with the highest average unemployment rates. Unemployment rates are not calculated for local authority areas smaller than counties, or regions in Scotland.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General what was the number of those unemployed for 12 months and more in May 1979; what is the current number; and what has been the percentage increase.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. On 10 April 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,356,509. The corresponding number of unemployed registrants in April 1979—not available for May 1979—was 366,711. The figures are not strictly comparable because of changes in the way the figures are collected.

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General how many people were unemployed in each electoral division in Portsmouth, at the latest available date; and if he will show the percentage change from the same period three years ago.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. Figures are given showing the numbers of unemployed claimants as at 8 May 1986 in the wards of the Portsmouth local authority district. Statistics of unemployment for electoral wards are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983. Moreover, comparisons with May 1983 would have been affected by the 1983 Budget provisions, which means that certain older men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer have to sign on to obtain national insurance credits or supplementary benefits, and by the change in the timing of compilation of unemploymemnt statistics in March 1986.

Community Programme

Mr. Craigen asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received about extending the length of time an individual could be employed in the community programme for up to two years; and what consideration he is giving to the merits of the proposals.

Mr. Lang: I have received a number of representations from hon. Members and others about the normal length of participation allowed on the community programme.

The period of employment for participants is normally limited to one year and I have no present plans to change this arrangement. However, managers, supervisors and other key workers may be retained where there are no suitable replacements from amongst eligible long-term unemployed people and we are currently considering the recommendation in the report "Value for Money in the Community Programme" that managers and supervisors should be retained for two years as a matter of course.

Home Working

Ms. Harman asked the Paymaster General when the Health and Safety Commission intends to issue regulations or guidance in respect of home working.

Mr. Trippier: The Health and Safety Commission hopes to consider proposals on home working later this year.

Parental Leave

Mrs. Beckett asked the Paymaster General how many representations have been received by the Department of Employment on the European Commission's proposals for parental leave since the matter was last discussed by EEC Employment Ministers on 5 December 1985.

Mr. Lang: At 11 June we had received 152 representations.

Labour Statistics

Ms. Richardson asked the Paymaster General what number and proportion of the employed labour force have a length of service in employment of (a) less than two years and (b) less than five years; and what number and proportion of those employed for less than five years are part-time workers working (i) less than eight hours, (ii) less than 12 hours, (iii) less than 16 hours and (iv) less than 20 hours a week, giving the most recently available figures.

Mr. Lang: Information is not available in the exact form requested.

The regularly published employed labour force series does not identify length of service in employment or number of hours worked a week.

The labour force survey (LFS) provides information on a different basis but allows the above analyses. Preliminary LFS results for the spring of 1985 are presented in the following tables:

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General if he will give the number of unemployed claimants by ward in Walthamstow in June 1983 and in the latest month for which figures are available.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in June 1983 and May 1986 in each ward of the Walthamstow parliamentary constituency. This comparison is affected by seasonal factors, the 1983 Budget provisions, which meant that certain older men, mainly aged 60 and over, no longer have to sign on to obtain national insurance credits or supplementary benefit, and by the change in the timing of compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986.

Construction Industry Training Board

Mr. Thurham asked the Paymaster General what is the estimated total of levy payments to the Construction Industry Training Board during the current year.

Mr. Trippier: The latest forecast income of the Construction Industry Training Board from levy for the 1986-87 financial year is £50 million.

Regional Employment

Mr. Adley asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to encourage employment in the regions.

Mr. Lang: Our policies to bring about an enterprising competitive economy have led to the creation of nearly a million extra jobs throughout Great Britain since March 1983.

All regions will benefit from the new package of measures announced in the Budget to accelerate the growth of enterprise, boost opportunities for the young, and help the long-term unemployed find work. In addition, a pilot scheme of task forces has been set up in eight small inner city areas to develop new approaches to job creation and enterprise to benefit local residents.

EC (Employment Strategy)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Paymaster General if he will place in the Library a copy of the paper produced for discussion at the Council of Ministers by Her Majesty's Government entitled "Employment Growth into the 1990's: a Strategy for the Employment Market."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have already done so.

SCOTLAND

Employment (Stirling)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish for the Queensland division of the Stirling constituency the structure of employment consistent with table 2 in appendix 2 of the Highlands and Islands Development Board's 20 annual report (1985).

Mr. Allan Stewart: I regret that this information is not available.

Refuse Disposal

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by local authority and for all Scotland (a) the number of people employed in refuse collection in 1979-80 and the year for which the most recent figures are available and (b) the number of people employed in street cleansing in 1979-80 and the year for which the most recent figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available centrally in the form requested.

Glasgow (Woodlands Advice Centre)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to reply to Glasgow district council concerning the Woodlands advice centre extension of urban aid funding application submitted in February.

Mr. Ancram: Consideration of this application has raised a number of issues which the Scottish Development Department is currently investigating with Glasgow district council. I hope that it will be possible to notify a decision shortly.

Legal Aid

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the number and percentage of criminal legal aid cases refused in each sheriffdom and in each legal aid committee area in Scotland in the last year for which figures are available and an indication of what these offences related to.

Mr. John MacKay: The information on refusals of criminal legal aid is not readily available in the form requested. The following tables give details for each Sheriff and District Court for 1984-85. Information about the offences for which legal aid was refused is not available.

National Radiological Protection Board

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if any staff of the National Radiological Protection Board are based permanently in Stornoway for the purposes of measuring radioactivity; to what extent the board employs other agencies or persons to carry out sampling work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The National Radiological Protection Board has no staff based permanently at Stornoway. The board does not maintain staff or employ other agencies for the purpose solely of undertaking sampling work.

In the context of a nuclear emergency the board has the function of providing information and advice. For this purpose its role includes obtaining, collecting and interpreting measurements of several kinds from many sources so as to build up a complete picture of the distribution of radioactivity resulting from the incident and to assess its radiological consequences.

Water (Lead Content)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the best estimate currently available of the cost involved in reducing the lead content of drinking water in Scotland to the limits as set out in European Community directive 80/778 and the information on which this is based.

Mr. Ancram: This information is not available. The reduction of the lead content of drinking water is to be achieved (a) by local authorities which do not identify these costs separately from other more general costs incurred in the treatment of water and (b) by the gradual elimination of domestic lead plumbing.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional resources of finance or manpower he has made available to water authorities in respect of lead contamination of drinking water to (a) undertake the programme of lead identification studies and (b) ensure Scotland's compliance with European Community legislation; and if he will consider making additional resources available to accelerate the implementation of this legislation.

Mr. Ancram: An appropriate adjustment was made to relevant expenditure for rate support grant in 1982-83 for the costs of lead identification surveys carried out by local authorities. The local authorities responsible for water supply have to implement the EC drinking water directive in addition to their other duties. To take account of this my right hon. and learned Friend plans to allocate extra capital expenditure provision of some £20 million over the three year period from 1986-87 to cover inter alia work in connection with the directive.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive the outstanding results of the programme of lead identification studies undertaken by water authorities in respect of European Community directive 80/778; and when he intends to publish these results.

Mr. Ancram: The outstanding results are expected in July 1986. The lead identification surveys, which the Government arranged for purposes other than its obligations under the EC Directive, comprise one step in a remedial programme which has been running for many years. When the water authorities have taken the appropriate remedial action, further surveys will be necessary to establish its effectiveness. Consideration will be given to the publication of the results at the appropriate stage.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide details of the Government's programme, together with the proposed timescale, for the reduction of lead contamination of drinking water in Scotland, which accompanied the Government's application to the European Commission for a delay in implementing the terms of European Community directive 80/778.

Mr. Ancram: The Government's application to the European Commission sought a delay of five years to comply with the directive's requirements in respect of lead in drinking water. The application covered Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and certain water authority areas in England. Information was provided on the levels of lead in drinking water and on the various contributory factors. The application described the action already taken to improve this aspect of the quality of drinking water and the steps required to identify and remedy the remaining drinking water supplies which contain high lead concentrations, for example by treatment of water, replacement of supply pipes by water authorities, and replacement of domestic lead plumbing through the home improvement grant scheme. The Commission has not yet reached a decision on the application.

Fine Default

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons in Scotland, separately enumerated for each category of conviction, having been find in the district court on conviction for (a) petty assault, (b) breach of the peace, (c) being drunk and incapable and (d) being drunk and disorderly, were subsequently received into prison for the fine default in each of the years from 1978 to 1985; in each case, what percentage of the total number fined for that particular offence that number represented; for the same categories of conviction over the same period, what number and percentage of those were given no time to pay, and of that number, what number and percentage were subsequently received into custody for fine default; and if he will also detail the same information in respect of Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Mr. John MacKay: The available information is set out in the table. Information as to whether persons fined were given time to pay is available only in respect of those received into custody for fine default, not for those whose fines were paid or discharged without recourse to the sanction of imprisonment.

Notes

1. Where multiple offences are involved persons are classified to the highest ranked crime in the standard classification.
2. During 1983 the offence of being drunk and disorderly was deleted from the standard crime classification, following the implementation of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Duty Solicitor Scheme

Mr. John Morris asked the Attorney-General which parts of the United Kingdom are not now covered by the duty solicitor scheme; what is the shortfall; and what proposals there are to remedy deficiencies.

The Solicitor-General: The information on the coverage of the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme currently available from the Law Society is given in the table.

The Law Society is now confident that it is making substantial progress in overcoming the initial problems and is considering how best to achieve complete coverage.

Similar information on the magistrates' courts duty solicitor scheme cannot be assembled in the time available, but I will write to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Food Imports from Eastern Europe

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest situation concerning food imports from eastern Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 9 June, at column 98, to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory).

Falkland Islands (Chinese Fishing Vessel)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is now in a position to make a statement on the attack by the Argentine Navy on the Republic of China fishing vessels on 28 May off the Falklands.

Mr. Eggar: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office issued a statement on 29 May about this incident. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Diplomatic Service

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of (a) the total diplomatic staff, (b) the senior diplomatic staff and (c) ambassadors and high commissioners in the British Diplomatic Service abroad are women.

Mr. Eggar: The answers are as follows:

(a) 29·63 per cent., ie 742 women out of 2,504 staff, including clerical, secretarial and security staff, but excluding communications officers;

(b) 4·36 per cent., ie 33 women out of 757 staff in DS grade 6 (First Secretary) and above;

(c) of 129 British ambassadors or high commissioners, at present one is female, another woman officer heads a consulate-general, and there are two other women in the senior grade abroad.

All these figures relate to membership of the Diplomatic Service serving overseas.

University Research Project

Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the cost to the EEC of the research project undertaken by Reading university and the university of Bologna, Italy, over three years involving visits to European centres in order to establish a league table of the prosperity and attractiveness to travellers of those centres.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1983 Reading university was asked by the Commission to undertake a study into urban decline in the European Community. Bologna university was not involved. The study has not yet been published. I will write to my hon. Friend when I have further details of the study and its costs.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he secured any further information on the attitude and policy of the new French Government to the Channel tunnel project at his meeting with the French Foreign Minister in France on Monday 9 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend did not discuss the Channel tunnel in detail with the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Raimond, when they met on 10 June. However, the matter was discussed between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and his French colleague on 9 June, when they both welcomed the progress that was being made.

Albania

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to re-open formal diplomatic relations with Albania; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We formally notified the Albanian Government in 1980 that we were ready to re-establish diplomatic relations without preconditions. As we have made clear, this offer remains open, but the Albanian Government have regrettably not yet taken it up.

Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the implications of the need to continue testing of United Kingdom nuclear weapons for safety and operational reasons for negotiations on a comprehensive test ban treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: In the continuing absence of a comprehensive test ban (CTB) we will take necessary measures, including periodic testing when appropriate, to ensure that our national deterrent can perform the defensive task for which it is designed. Our commitment to a CTB has always reflected our acceptance of the potential difficulties for the maintenance of effective nuclear forces that such an agreement could create. But that hypothetical issue does not need addressing in the present circumstances.

Chagos Archipelago

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to facilitate the return of the Ilois to the Chagos archipelago; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: No. The islands of the Chagos archipelago are reserved for defence purposes. There is therefore no question of the Ilois being able to return for settlement. In 1982, the United Kingdom Government made an ex gratia payment of £4 million to the Government of Mauritius to set up a trust fund, the express purpose of which was to assist with the resettlement of the Ilois in Mauritius as self-sufficient members of the community. It was warmly welcomed by the Government of Mauritius who, for their part, provided land to the value of £1 million. The Ilois community was fully associated with the agreement, with representatives taking part in the negotiations as members of the all-party Mauritian delgation.

Foreign Citizens (Government Intervention)

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 11 June, Official Report, column 309, what criteria Her Majesty's Government use in deciding whether they have any locus standi to intervene on behalf of the citizens of a sovereign independent country; and if he will explain the application of those criteria (a) to South Africa and (b) Nepal.

Mr. Eggar: Violations of international standards for the protection of human rights are a legitimate matter of international concern, wherever they occur. We make our views know in all appropriate ways. We apply the same criteria to South Africa and Nepal.

Intervention in the sense of exercising diplomatic or consular protection has to be confined to British nationals in accordance with the rules of international law.

European Single Act

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he took, and when, to print or publicise the terms of the decision adopted by Ministers on the occasion of the signing of the European Single Act on 28 February; if this document has been reported under the terms of the Vienna convention on treaties; and whether this decision is intended to form part of the European Single Act.

Mrs. Chalker: I assume the hon. Member refers to "the decision adopted by Ministers, meeting in the framework of European political co-operation, on the occasion of the Single European Act".

The text of this decision was deposited in the Library of the House on 25 April. It was also annexed to the FCO memorandum for the Foreign Affairs Committee on the Single European Act (FCO/FAC/10/86) of 23 April and is published on pages 44 to 47 of the minutes of evidence taken on 7 May 1986 by the Committee. The decision adopted by the Ministers of the member states of the EC meeting in political co-operation sets out procedures for the practical application of certain aspects of title III of the Single European Act. It does not form part of the Single European Act and has not been registered under article 102 of the United Nations charter as an international agreement.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Trains (Bomb Explosions)

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has made representations to the Irish Republic regarding those occasions when bombs have been placed on trains while in the Republic of Ireland and which have subsequently exploded in the United Kingdom; and how many such incidents have occurred.

Mr. Scott: No such representations have been made. Although it is not possible to be certain of the circumstances in every case, I believe that four such incidents have occurred since 1977.

Enter and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Dr. Boyson: The information requested is as follows:

The Fisheries Act (N.I.) 1966—27 Officials.

The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978—135 officials acting as Inspectors under the Explosives Act 1875.

The Companies (N.I.) Order 1978—It is not possible to quantify the number of officials involved, since it is a matter of designating an appropriate individual to enter and search in cases as they arise.

Intergovernmental Council (Stalker Report)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he intends the Stalker report to be discussed by the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: The report of the inquiry is submitted to the Chief constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary who in turn forwards it to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland for his directions. The Government, and therefore the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference, have no locus in this process.

Armagh District Council

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received seeking the appointment of a commissioner to discharge the functions of Armagh district council, in the light of its failure to appoint staff to the new Armagh city leisure centre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I have received no such representa-tions.

Francis Brodley (Shooting)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the result of the investigation into the events leading to the shooting of Francis Bradley in County Derry on 18 February 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 11 June 1986 c. 193]: Police inquiries have not yet been completed. As soon as they have, a file will be submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions for his direction. An inquest will also be held.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mental Patients

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many mental patients, in all categories, the North Lincolnshire health authority and the Grimsby health authority are responsible for at present; and as to the authorities' planning forecast of the numbers to 1991.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that the information requested is not available centrally. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the chairmen of the two health authorities. The latest centrally held information about the number of resident patients and of attendances is given in the table.

Numbers (Provisional)

	Residents at 31 December 1985	Attendances at out-patient clinics during 1985*	Day care attendances† during 1985

Mental handicap hospitals and units	137	8	nil

* Clinics conducted by the medical staff of the hospital or unit.
† Includes attendances by in-patients at day hospitals.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many hostel places for mental patients the Lincolnshire county council social services department and the Humberside county council social services department currently provide.

Mr. Whitney: The information available centrally does not distinguish between hostels and homes. The latest information available is given in the table. Local authorities also support some residents in private and voluntary accommodation. The information collected centrally is published in "Homes and Hostels for the Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped — England". Copies of this publication up to 31 March 1983 have been placed in the Library.

Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many qualified psychiatric nurses are employed by (a) the North Lincolnshire health authority, (b) the Lincolnshire county council social services department, (c) the Grimsby health authority and (d) the Humberside county council social services department.

Mr. Whitney: Information about staff employed by county council social service departments is not held by this Department. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the two local authorities concerned for the information requested at (b) and (d) of his question.

Specific qualifications in mental illness and mental handicap nursing cannot be identified centrally in respect of National Health Service employees. I suggest therefore that the hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of the two health authorities concerned direct for the information he seeks.

Numbers of all SR and SE nurses working in the specialties of mental illness and mental handicap in the two health authorities are given in the table. However, it should be noted that the latest available figures are as at 30 September 1984.

Mental Health Units

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the projected costs of running the mental health units of the North Lincolnshire health authority and the Grimsby health authority in the current financial year; what are the planned costs in each of the next four financial years; and how these costs are divided between Grimsby and North Lincolnshire.

Mr. Whitney: Responsibility for the provision of local mental health services lies with individual regional and district health authorities. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the chairmen of the North Lincolnshire and Grimsby health authorities for the information he requires.

Industrial Diseases

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether there are any forms of repetitive strain injury which are not prescribed industrial diseases; and what criteria are used to exclude any diseases not so prescribed.

Mr. Newton: "Repetitive strain injury" is a term used to describe a range of conditions, some ill-defined, affecting the hand, arm, shoulder or neck, caused or aggravated by repeated movements.

Two forms are prescribed as industrial diseases: cramp of the hand or forearm due to repetitive movements (Prescribed Disease A4) and traumatic inflammation of the sheaths of the hand or forearm or of the associated tendon sheaths (Prescribed Disease A8). Benefit can also be paid for carpal tunnel syndrome if it occurs as a result of Prescribed Disease A8.

The criteria for prescription are set out in section 76(2) of the Social Security Act 1975. A disease may be prescribed if it can be shown on the balance of probabilities to be a risk of a particular occupation and if individual cases can be attributed with reasonable certainty to the nature of the occupation. The Government are advised on the prescription of industrial diseases by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council which has concluded that there is insufficient evidence at present to warrant the prescription of any further forms of repetitive strain injury. The council will continue to keep new evidence under review.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is yet able to evaluate the effectiveness of the publicity campaign highlighting the dangers of contracting acquired immune deficiency syndrome; whether he will consider extending the campaign to include television advertisements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is too early to come to firm conclusions as the campaign is still at a very early stage. The use of television for future stages of the campaign is one of a number of options being considered.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the proposed extent of the distribution of the Health Education Council leaflet on acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Hayhoe: The leaflet will continue to be available to members of the general public by post on request or through local health education units, the family planning information service and other organisations.

Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his plans for the future of the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital at Stanmore.

Mr. Whitney: As I explained when I wrote to the hon. Member on 9 June, Bloomsbury district health authority is currently reviewing its services. Any proposals which may arise from this review which affect the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital will be put to public consultation before any decision is taken by Ministers.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the 10 local authorities with the highest social services expenditure and the sums spent by each of the authorities on social services in 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Whitney: The 10 English local authorities with the highest personal social services net current expenditure in the years 1983-84 to 1985-86 are:

£ million cash

Waiting Lists

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for every regional health authority area the ratio of National Health Service beds to patients on waiting lists in 1979 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Whitney: The ratio the hon. Member asks for would be without significance. The relevant information is given in the table:

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those hospitals which have reduced their waiting lists most in the last three years; and if he will make a statement about Scunthorpe general hospital's performance in this regard.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 3 June 1986, c. 533-36]: I regret that the percentage decreases in waiting lists given in column 3 of table 1 were incorrect. The amended figures are given in the table.

Health Authorities (Tendering)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress made by health authorities on competitive tendering in the fields of catering, cleaning and laundry and give details in each case as to whether contracts have been awarded in-house or to outside contractors.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish in the Official Report details of the progress made by district health authorities in putting their services out to tender in the manner of the answer given on 14 April, Official Report, columns 273-280;

(2) if he will name for each tendering exercise of which his Department is aware and which was completed since his answer of 14 April, Official Report, columns 279-286, the health authority, the hospital concerned and the successful tenderer.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let my hon. Friend and the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Carers

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has on the physical, emotional and mental stresses imposed upon carers called upon to cope with a range of serious or terminal medical conditions and to perform duties normally performed by nurses in hospitals;

(2) if any official survey has recently been undertaken to establish the actual cost per annum to the carer in caring for a relative, and the cost saved by the state per annum for a similar service in a hospital bed.

Mr. Whitney: The kind of care provided by relatives, friends or neighbours is invaluable, and is not directly comparable with other ways of looking after dependent people. The Department funded a review by the social policy research unit at York university of research on informal care published in 1985 and entitled "With Due Care and Attention". This drew attention to the physical, emotional and mental stresses to which carers are subject.

The Department is now funding a further programme of research at York university which should provide some information about the financial aspects of caring. In addition, questions in the 1985 general household survey and the current major Office of Population censuses and Surveys' survey of disability will provide a considerable body of new information about various aspects of caring.

Family Planning

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, further to his reply of the 22 May to the hon. Member for Hyndburn, Official Report, column 312, what stipulations or conditions were attached to the grants and support for work on natural methods of family planning.

Mr. Whitney: The Catholic Marriage Advisory Council is the only organisation whose grant is specifically for natural family planning work. The grant is subject to the standard conditions attaching to all departmental grants provided under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968.

National Insurance and Child Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 3 June on the effect of certain changes in rate of national insurance and child benefit, what the cost would be of answering this question; and if he will detail how this sum is arrived at.

Mr. Newton: The cost of estimating the effects on the numbers claiming supplementary benefit and housing benefit of the changes in rate of national insurance benefit and child benefit is calculated to be about £600 to £700 in staff and computer time. However, I have reconsidered the matter and concluded that it would nevertheless be appropriate to seek to provide the information the hon. Member seeks. This will be done as soon as possible.

Vaccine Damage Payments

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for vaccine damage payments have been rejected on the grounds that they were made after the expiry date.

Mr. Whitney: At 30 May 1986, the latest date for which information is available, 49 claims were rejected because the claim was made outside the six-year time limit laid down by the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979.

Single Payments (Claims)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for single payments are currently being processed at the Edinburgh East office of his Department; how many of those claimants have been waiting for more than 18 days; what advice is being given to claimants about the likely waiting time; what steps are being taken to clear the backlog; and how this situation at Edinburgh East compares with rest of Scotland and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Major: Single payment claims from 2,590 claimants are currently being processed at the Edinburgh East office; and about 1,900 of these have been waiting for more than 18 days for a decision. Comparable figures for the rest of Scotland and the United Kingdom are not available.

There has been an upsurge in single payment claims resulting from a take-up campaign mounted by Lothian council. Urgent claims being given priority and claimants are being advised individually that there are likely to be longer than usual delays in processing single payments claims. Extra staff are being deployed on this work by diverting them from other duties within the office and extra help is being provided by the regional office.

Hospitals (Funding)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in tabular form the information he has on the amount of funding each hospital in (a) Greater London and (b) Southampton has received in each of the last six years; (i) in real terms, (ii) in nominal terms and (iii) the percentage change each year.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that information in the form requested is not held centrally and could not be assembled without disproportionate expense.

Health Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London, and for each year since 1979, the number of (a) medical staff, (b) nursing staff and (c) ancillary staff, expressing these figures both in terms of actual numbers of employees and in whole time equivalent terms; and if he will also give these figures adjusted to account for the change in the working week.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that I cannot give the hon. Member all the information he seeks. Information for district health authorities prior to 1982 is not comparable with the information for later years, due to the 1982 National Health Service reorganisation. Senior medical and dental staff have their contracts with regional health authorities or teaching districts only, and are not therefore allocated to individual districts. The figures in the tables show medical and dental staff at regional health authority level only.

No adjustment to the nursing and midwifery figures is necessary, since the tables do not cover the period between 1979 and 1981 when the change in working hours took place.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London and for each year since 1979 (a) the total joint finance expenditure and (b) the total overspend or underspend for joint finance.

Mr. Hayhoe: The tables show total joint finance expenditure by area health authorities for the years 1978-79 to 1981-82, and by district health authorities for the years 1982-83 to 1984-85.

I regret that information on overspending and underspending of joint finance at area and district level is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to approach the chairmen of the Thames regional health authorities for further information.

Notes:

1. The figures are derived from health authorities' summarised accounts.
2. The 1982 reorganisation of the National Health Service resulted in substantial and complex boundary changes and changes in management responsibility, and it is therefore not possible to make direct comparisons between the pre- and post-1982 authorities.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give, drawing from the regional plans for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London and for each year up to 1994, the proposed expenditure per head of population (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms;

(2) if he will give, drawing from the regional plans, for each year up to 1994 the proposed increase or decrease in expenditure expressed (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms; and if he will give in each case the proportion of the change attributable to (i) national Resource Allocation Working Party and (ii) subregional resource allocation policies.

Mr. Hayhoe: Regional strategic plans do not contain year by year detail of the kind requested; they are intended to provide a broad framework, within which there remains some flexibility to respond to changing circumstances. The plans themselves are not rigid, and regions continue to review and update them as necessary. The hon. Member may wish to approach the chairmen of the Thames regional health authorities for such information as is available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London and for each year since 1979 the expenditure per head of population (a) in cash terms (b) deflated by the gross domestic product deflator and (c) deflated by the National Health Service deflator.

Mr. Hayhoe: Expenditure per head of population is not a good basis for comparison between health authorities: it does not reflect the greater demands made on health services by the very young and the elderly, or differing patterns of morbidity. Nor does it take account of patient flows across health authority boundaries, which are particularly significant in a metropolitan area. The information requested would therefore be of limited value and disproportionately costly to prepare.

For resource allocation purposes, population figures are weighted to take account of these factors, and adjusted to reflect cross boundary flows. Expenditure in proportion to districts' weighted population provides a better measure for comparison both between authorities and over time. I regret that this information is not available centrally in respect of health authorities in Greater London, but the hon. Member may wish to approach the chairmen of the Thames regional health authorities for further details.

The London postgraduate special health authorities do not serve a specific resident population.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London the percentage change in expenditure since 1979 expressed in (a) cash terms, (b) deflated by the gross domestic product deflator and (c) deflated by the National Health Service deflator; and if he will give in each case the proportion of the change attributable to: (i) national resources allocation working parties and (ii) subregional resource allocation policies.

Mr. Hayhoe: The table shows expenditure by area health authorities and board of governors for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals in 1978-79 and by district health authorities and special health authorities in 1984-85 in cash terms. This information, expressed at 1978-79 price levels as measured by the gross domestic product deflator, was given in my reply to the hon. Member on 17 December 1985 at columns 145 to 148. As I explained to the hon. Member in my reply to him on 23 May at columns 385-386, it is not appropriate to revalue district health authority expenditure by reference to centrally assessed movements in pay and prices.

I regret that, because of the boundary changes and changes in management responsibility which resulted from the 1982 reorganisation of the National Health Service, it is not possible to make direct comparisons between authorities' expenditure over this period.

It is not possible from the information available centrally to determine how far changes in expenditure are attributable to national and sub-regional resource allocation decisions respectively, or to other factors such as the level of transfers from revenue to capital. The hon. Member may like to seek further information from the regional chairmen concerned.

Notes:

1. The figures are derived from health authorities' summarised accounts.
2. The 1982 re-organisation of the National Health Service resulted in substantial and complex boundary changes and changes in management responsibility. In addition to these changes there was a major restructuring of the boards of governors for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals as follows:
   (a) Bloomsbury health authority now manages the Royal National Throat, Nose and Ear hospitals, the Royal National Orthopaedic hospitals and St. Peter's hospitals;
   (b) West Lambeth health authority now manages St. John's hospital for Diseases of the Skin;
   (c) Hammersmith hospital was given special health authority status.

Administrative and Clerical Establishments

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures have been taken by his Department and by regional health authorities to ensure that controls over districts' administrative and clerical establishments do not lead to the use of agency staff, nursing assistants or nursing auxiliaries to fulfil these functions.

Mr. Hayhoe: The control and deployment of administrative and clerical staff within districts is a matter for regional and district health authorities to determine in the light of local circumstances. The overall reduction in agency staff, nursing assistants and nursing auxiliaries since 1981 suggests that management costs control has not led to the use of these staff to fulfil functions proper to administrative and clerical grades.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures have been taken (a) by his Department and (b) by regional health authorities to control districts' administrative and clerical establishments since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: Nationally, health authorities have been told to examine critically administrative and clerical staffing levels and, as they have done, to concentrate resources on staff providing direct care to patients. In the current year, they have been asked to exercise restraint pending a review of administrative and clerical staff being undertaken by the Management Board in conjunction with regional general managers. Management costs have also been controlled and overall authorities achieved a 14 per cent. reduction between 1980 and 1985. Locally, a variety of control measures have been employed. In some regions, for example, targets for administrative and clerical staffing levels have been agreed based on districts' short term programmes. Performance indicators are also used by regions and districts to investigate their performance.

Health Authorities (Beds)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he he will give, drawing from the regional plans, for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London and for each year up to 1994, the number of beds proposed for (a) acute patients, (b) the elderly, (c) the mentally ill and (d) paediatric cases.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not available. The Thames regions' strategic plans are not yet all approved and discussions on the numbers of beds required in each specialty are still taking place between the respective regional and district health authorities.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London and for each year since 1979 the number of beds for (a) acute patients, (b) the elderly, (c) the mentally ill and (d) psychiatric cases.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have the available information as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give, drawing from the regional plans for each health authority wholly or partly within Greater London, and for each year up to 1994, the proposed number of (a) medical staff, (b) nursing staff and (c) ancillary staff, expressing these figures both in terms of actual numbers of employees and in whole-time equivalent terms.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that the information requested is not available. The Thames regions' strategic plans are not yet all approved and discussions on the manpower proposals are still taking place between regional and district health authorities.

Gynaecological Treatment

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the women awaiting in-patient gynaecological treatment in England are infertility cases.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information in precisely the form he seeks. In 1984, the latest year for which figures are available centrally, in-patient cases admitted from the waiting list and treated for female infertility represented an estimated 4·3 per cent. of all cases admitted from the waiting list and discharged from gynaecology departments during the year. On 30 September 1984 there were 91,680 women on in-patient waiting lists for gynaecology in England.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his best estimates as to the number of foreigners in receipt of supplementary benefit and the cost in the following categories (a) Irish, (b) other non-United Kingdom citizens of the EEC, (c) Commonwealth, (d) other foreigners and (e) total.

Mr. Major: Details of the citizenship or nationality of persons claiming supplementary benefit are not relevant to the determination of claims and are not, therefore, generally collected. Some statistics are available for nationals of the European Community—excluding Eire — to whom 1,078 awards were made in 1985. The circumstances of claimants vary widely and it is not possible to estimate costs.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has of the proportion of state retirement pensioners, including the self-employed, who are also in receipt of occupational pensions.

Mr. Newton: Our best estimate is for the year 1984, when about 37 per cent. of individuals in receipt of state retirement pension were also in receipt of an occupational pension. No sufficiently reliable information is available for those people who were self-employed and had made private pension arrangements.

School Leavers (Supplementary Benefit)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what circumstances pupils leaving school after the Easter holiday may become eligible for supplementary benefit before the first Monday in September of the same year.

Mr. Newton: The entitlement to supplementary benefit of individual school leavers is a matter for the independent adjudication authorities. The chief adjudication officer's guidance on this issue is in circular S 51/86, a copy of which is in the Library.

NHS Staff (Pay)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is (a) the total cost of the latest pay awards to National Health Service staff and (b) the total additional sum made available to health authorities to meet these costs.

Mr. Hayhoe: The cost to the hospital and community health services in England in 1986-87 of the pay awards to review body staff announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 22 May at columns 239 to 244 will be £282 million.

Extra funding of £50 million has been added to health authorities' cash limits for 1986-87 and authorities are also benefiting from the fall in general inflation. Forecast general inflation was 4·5 per cent. when public expenditure provision for 1986-87 was decided, but the budget forecast was 3·75 per cent. which is equivalent to a saving for health authorities in England of some £20 million on their non-pay expenditure. The Government's assessment is that the additional £50 million funding, together with the fall in inflation, will enable health authorities to pay for the review body awards without adversely affecting patient services.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for severe weather payments were made in 1985 and 1986 to date in his Department's office in Portsmouth; and how many claims were successful.

Mr. Major: Separate information on the number of claims for exceptionally severe weather payments is not collected, but a total of 861 payments were made by the Portsmouth local office in 1985. Information for 1986 is not yet available. When the period during which payments are likely to be made is over, local offices will be asked to make a return so that the total number of payments made can be calculated.

Gypsy Rose Quinn

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information was given to the press by his Department concerning the benefits case of Gypsy Rose Quinn prior to 17 May.

Mr. Major: Requests for information were received from the press following Mrs. Quinn's appearances at the Birmingham magistrates court on 27 March 1986 and at the Birmingham Crown court on 16 May 1986. The information given was restricted to confirming factual details of the offences with which Mrs. Quinn had been charged.

NHS Staff

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library the report on reducing National Health Service administrative staff, discussed at a meeting of regional general managers.

Mr. Hayhoe: The NHS Management Board is currently undertaking a review of administrative and clerical staff in conjunction with regional general managers, and has had several discussions with them to decide how best to maximise the efficiency of administrative staffing. They have considered various discussion papers, but I am not aware of any discussions on a report on reducing administrative staff.

"Guide to Healthy Eating"

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps will be taken to ensure that there are sufficient quantities of the Health Education Council's booklet, "Guide to Healthy Eating", to meet the demand from health education officers in health authorities.

Mr. Whitney: More than 1 million copies of the booklet are being printed, and each health education unit has been allocated 3,000 initially. Health education officers will be able to obtain further copies, if required.

Kidney Donation

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent visit by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) to the United States of America to discuss the possible lessons for the United Kingdom of the operation in certain states of an opting-out kidney donation scheme.

Mr. Whitney: I am not aware that an opting-out kidney donation scheme has been introduced in any American state. On my recent visit to the United States, I discussed with health officials in New York the effects of the "required request" system of organ donation which has been introduced by law in certain states. This system requires hospital administrators to ensure that the relatives of all suitable organ donors are asked for their consent that the organs be removed. I was informed that in the short time in which "required request" has been in operation no major difficulties in such a system have emerged and organ donation rates have increased.

We are examining with representative bodies of the medical profession the possibility of introducing a voluntary code of practice in this country to achieve the same effect.

McColl Report

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to conclude his consultations on recommendations on the McColl report and to reach a decision as to which recommendations to implement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Interested bodies were invited to comment on the recommendations in the McColl report by 30 April 1986. To date about 50 responses have been received, and these are being considered. I asked the National Health Service Management Board to report on the major issues raised by the report by the middle of the year. I hope to be able to announce decisions on these major issues before the summer recess.

Supplementary Benefit Claimants

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of supplementary benefit claimants at (a) Westfield House, Law Russell House and Leeds Road, Bradford, and (b) nationally, for the latest available year.

Mr. Major: The numbers of people receiving supplementary benefit from the three specified Bradford offices on 6 May 1986, together with the national figure for the same date are as follows:

	Number
Westfield House (Bradford West)	13,755
Law Russell House (Bradford South)	13,510
Leeds Road (Bradford West)	14,065
Nationally	5,085,627

Source: 100 per cent. count of live cases in action.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of, average amount paid, and annual cost of, housing benefit paid to (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds, respectively, for the latest available year.

Mr. Major: This information is not collected centrally, and, I regret, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Family Credit Scheme

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the outcome of his discussions with various bodies on the operation of the proposed family credit scheme.

Mr. Newton: An announcement about the outcome of the reconsideration of the payment mechanism for family credit will be made as soon as possible.

Consultants

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that the arrangements for ensuring that part-time consultants in the National Health Service work the full number of their contractual hours for the National Health Service are effective.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 19 December 1985 at column 312.

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many consultants working in the National Health Service are on part-time contracts; and what proportion of the total that number represents.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of medical and dental consultants working in the National Health Service in England at 30 September 1985 are set out in the table:

Medical and Dental Consultants at 30 September 1985: England

	Number	Percent.
All staff	13,969	100
National Health Service Paid Staff
Whole-time staff	6,472	46
Part-time staff	5,840	42
Honorary staff	1,657	12

Mr. Victor Paige

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what terms Mr. Victor Paige terminated his contract as chairman of the National Health Service Board of Management.

Mr. Fowler: [pursuant to the reply, 9 June 1986, c. 96]: There were no particular provisions, such as severance pay, for termination.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what terms Mr. Victor Paige was appointed as chairman of the National Health Service Management Board.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to the reply, 9 June 1986, c. 96]: Mr. Paige was appointed chairman of the National Health Service Management Board with the rank of second permanent secretary on a three-year contract beginning 2 January 1985.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much Mr. Victor Paige has been paid in respect of the current financial year.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to the reply, 9 June 1986, 96]: Mr. Paige has been paid a gross salary of £12,737 in the current financial year and a further £7,388 will be due to him at the end of June. This includes an amount in lieu of the entitlement he would have received under the principal civil service pension scheme.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if Mr. Victor Paige's present termination of his contract was subject to any penalty clause; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to the reply, 9 June 1986, c. 96]: The contract provided for 12 months notice of termination on either side in normal circumstances, but it has been agreed that the requirement of notice should be waived in these particular circumstances.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance Mr. Victor Paige obtained from public funds with his private health insurance and his pension arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to the reply, 9 June 1986, c. 96]: Mr. Paige received no help towards any private health scheme. He made his own pension arrangements and was compensated in the normal way for loss of benefits he would have received under the principal civil service scheme. This took the form of a taxable addition to salary.

TRANSPORT

A19 Viaducts

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Transport how long he expects the A19 viaducts over the River Tees to continue in use.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The A19 viaduct over the River Tees was designed to last for 120 years and I have no reason to suppose that, with proper maintenance, this will not prove to be the case.

BR (Track Safety)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment the railways inspectorate has made of the safety hazard arising from debris on and adjacent to British Rail tracks arising from operational works; if any action has been proposed by the inspectorate in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Any question of debris on or adjacent to British Rail tracks is in the first instance a matter for the British Railways Board. The railway inspectorate, in the course of its inspections and visits, has on occasion had to draw the board's attention to the need to remove unwanted material from alongside the line. Such material can hazard trains if it is too close to the track, can hazard staff if it obstructs lineside walkways or refuges, and can provide vandals with a means of deliberately obstructing the railway.

Motor Cycling

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what conclusions he has reached regarding the effect on casualties of the package of motor cycling measures introduced under the Transport Act 1981; and if he will make a statement on future plans.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our review of the 1981 package suggests that there has been a positive impact on the development of training facilities and expertise, on the number of learner riders taking training and on the pass rate for the L (ie part II) test. But the number of learner riders taking formal training and passing both parts of the test still represents only a minority of the total. As yet there has been no measurable effect on the motor cycle casualty rate.

I intend very shortly to seek the views of outside organisations and individuals on how further progress can be achieved.

Helicopters

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ask the Civil Aviation Authority to introduce regulations to prevent helicopters flying over sea conditions outside their demonstrated sea-keeping capability.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Aviation safety regulation is solely the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. I will ask the chairman of the authority to write to the hon. Member.

Motor Cycle Licences

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the number and proportion of motor cycle provisional licences issued from 1 October 1982 which have been (a) replaced by a full licence and (b) allowed to lapse.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The range of statistical information available from records held at DVLC Swansea has recently been reviewed following replacement of obsolete equipment. Historical information is not fully available in the form requested.

Current records as at 2 June 1986 show:

	Number
First time holders of provisional motor cycle licence entitlement	*600,064
Number in second or subsequent period of entitlement	11,955
Number of records with expired motor cycle entitlement in the one year off period	*141,943
Number of provisional licence holders who have not applied to renew entitlement after one year off period	*89,014
Motor cycle test passes in 1985	45,483
Motor cycle test passes between 1 October 1982 and 31 December 1984	99,000

* Licence holders who pass a car test within their two-year entitlement gain unlimited provisional motor cycle licence entitlement.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what subjects relating to the Channel tunnel project were discussed at his meeting with the French Transport Minister in London on Monday 9 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend and the French Transport Minister discussed the Channel tunnel project in general terms (amongst other subjects) and welcomed the progress which was being made.

Bus Services (Disabled Persons)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to seek to ensure that special disabled bus services equipped with wheelchair facilities will continue to operate following bus service deregulation legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: It is for the relevant local authorities to decide what transport provision they wish to secure for members of the public who are disabled, in the light of the duty to have regard to such needs imposed on them by the Transport Act 1985.

M20 (Service Areas)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the current plans for the provision of motorway service areas on the M20 motorway.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to the reply, 23 May 1986, c. 341]: I have today announced the selection of sites for motorway service areas on the M20 at Hollingbourne to the east of Maidstone and at Westenhanger at junction

11. In addition, my predecessor agreed to a proposal for a service area at West Kingsdown, which is one of the subjects of a current planning inquiry.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC Trade Barriers

Mr. Lyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the internal barriers to trade within the European Economic Community affecting those industries and trades for whose interests his Department has responsibility.

Mr. Gummer: I will reply as soon as possible.

Intervention Board (Headquarters)

Mr. Silvester asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to announce his decision on a new site for the European Economic Community Intervention Board headquarters.

Mr. Jopling: I am currently considering with the other Agriculture Ministers whether to propose such a move and I hope to make an announcement shortly.

Food and Environment Protection Act (Regulation)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to lay the Food and Environment Protection Act regulations before the House.

Mrs. Fenner: We hope to be able to lay before the House at the end of this month draft regulations under part III of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

THE ARTS

Galleries (Indemnity)

56. Mr. Powley asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the operation of the revised formula for indemnity to galleries which regularly lend works of art for exhibition without requiring commercial insurance by the borrower.

Mr. Luce: I am happy to say that agreement has been reached on a revised formulation of the arrangements for considering compensation in the event of items on loan which are lost or damaged. I understand that in consequence those national galleries which have been reluctant to lend to local museums are now willing to resume the practice.

Young People (Musical Instruments)

57. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister for the Arts if he has any plans to establish a fund to enable young people to borrow musical instruments after leaving school.

Mr. Luce: No.

News International

58. Mr. Cartwright asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received concerning bans on the provision of News International newspapers in public libraries; and what action he proposes to take on such complaints.

Mr. Luce: I have received complaints that 15 library authorities have ceased to make News International newspapers available to the public. I have written to the authorities concerned to ask them whether the complaints are true and, if so, how they reconcile their action with their duties under the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964. I will consider what further action to take in the light of their replies.

Sponsorship

59. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the future of the business sponsorship incentive scheme in 1987-88.

Mr. Luce: The business sponsorship incentive scheme has introduced £7 million of new money, and I can confirm that it will continue in 1987-88.

60. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts what is his latest estimate of the amount and ratio of Government sponsorship of the arts of and to business and private sponsorship.

Mr. Luce: Central Government support for the arts in 1986-87 is estimated at some £320 million, and business sponsorship at some £20 million, a ratio of 16:1.

63. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Minister for the Arts what action his Department is taking to prepare for payroll giving to support for the arts.

Mr. Luce: I greatly welcome the opportunities for benefit to the arts from the proposals for payroll giving in the last Budget. Plans are now being drawn up by the Inland Revenue for a scheme to enable employees to make gifts to charity which qualify for tax relief and which can be deducted from their pay directly by employers. It is intended to have the scheme operational at the start of the next tax year. As well as commenting on draft proposals, the Office of Arts and Libraries plans to issue in due course a leaflet for arts organisations which will help them make the most of the new scheme.

Museums and Galleries

61. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the first report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee on revised financing arrangements for the national museums and galleries.

Mr. Luce: Yes. I announced on 10 February my intention to consult the Education, Science and Arts Committee, the Public Accounts Committee and the Treasury and Civil Service Committee about my proposals to implement the recommendations from the Education Committee's earlier report that the national museums and galleries should be given greater incentives both to maximise their receipts from non-Exchequer sources, and to use those receipts more effectively. My proposals were to allow the institutions greater freedom to retain their receipts and to give them the facility to carry over money from one financial year to the next, linked to a change in their financing arrangements to grant-in-aid. I have now consulted the Committees and am grateful for their helpful response. Revised Estimates will be presented to the Parliament tomorrow which will give effect to the change retrospectively from 1 April. There will be some minor reallocation between the cash limits announced in the Main Estimates, for the reasons given in my earlier statement.

The new cash limits are as follows:

	Original Cash limit £	Revised Cash limit £	Change
British Museum	13,425,000	13,345,000	(80,000)
Imperial War Museum	4,444,000	4,497,000	53,000
National Gallery	6,686,000	6,771,000	85,000
National Maritime Museum	4,773,000	4,462,000	(311,000)
National Portrait Gallery	1,819,000	1,814,000	(5,000)
Science Museum	9,133,000	9,171,000	38,000
Tate Gallery	5,649,000	5,782,000	133,000
Victoria and Albert Museum	10,935,000	11,023,000	88,000
Wallace Collection	907,000	906,000	(1,000)
Total	57,771,000	57,771,000	Nil

I have noted the comments of the Education, Science and Arts Committee and the Public Accounts Committee and will keep these in mind in monitoring the operation of the new arrangements.

65. Mr. Hayes asked the Minister for the Arts what is his response to the Education, Science and Arts Committee's report on museums and galleries' receipts.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway).

Charitable Status

62. Mr. Freud asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has had from the Arts Council and other bodies about the operation of charitable status in the subsidised theatre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I am aware of the strong concerns that have been expressed about the treatment of charities, but have received no specific representations about the operation of charitable status in the subsidised theatre.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated on 4 June that he does not now intend to proceed with two features of the original proposals in the Finance Bill — the distinction between "private indirect" and other charities; and the possible restriction of tax relief where the charity accumulates income.

Foreign Visitors

64. Mr. Jessel asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has about the trend in attendances by foreign visitors at arts functions over the past two months.

Mr. Luce: No overall figures are as yet available, but I know there is concern about falling American attendances. I hope our United States friends will be reassured that Britain is a very safe and welcoming country, with an excellent range of arts facilities and events.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the real exchange rate of the £ sterling based on (a) gross domestic product deflators and (b) relative export prices since the fourth quarter of 1976 against the United States dollar, the Japanese yen and each of the European Economic Community six currencies for the latest period for which figures are available; and if he will publish the current nominal exchange rate and the average rate for the latest convenient period.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Official Report is not a statistical abstract. The information requested is available in the normal sources.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the exchange rate between the £ sterling and the European currency unit on 1 January and 1 July for each year since 1980.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

£ ecu exchange rate

	1 January	1 July
1980	0·6465	0·6048
1981	0·5475	0·5504
1982	0·5677	0·5527
1983	0·6003	0·5831
1984	0·5707	0·5939
1985	0·6144	0·5650
1986	0·6153

Where these dates fall on a weekend or a bank holiday the rate for the last working day preceding the day in question is given.

Oil Revenue

Mr. Livsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of gross national product is represented by oil revenue as of the latest date that figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is estimated that, in 1985-86, Government revenues from oil and gas production in the United Kingdom and United Kingdom continental shelf amounted to 3¼ per cent. of gross national product. The prospects for North Sea revenues were discussed in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" and in the Treasury press notice "Government Revenues from the North Sea" published on Budget day.

Income Tax Fraud

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many income tax fraud investigators there are for the Portsmouth area; and how many people in the Portsmouth area have been successfully prosecuted in each of the last five years, indicating the total amounts involved for the same period.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Tax Units

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax units aged (a) under 16 years, (b) 16 years, (c) 17 years and (d) 18 years, respectively, made use of their personal allowance; and what was the average tax allowance used in (a) to (d) for the latest available year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EEC (Freedom of Movement)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Governmen towards, the harmonisation of income taxation provision with respect to freedom of movement for workers within the Community; and if he will take steps to publicise these proposals in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EEC (Alcoholic Drinks)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussion have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, harmonisation of the structure of excise duties on alcoholic drinks; and if he will take steps to publicise these proposals in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EEC (Mineral Oils)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards a proposal concerning the harmonisation of the structure of excise on mineral oils; and if he will take steps to publicise it in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EEC (Excise Duties)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, proposals for a Council decision providing for a stand-still ensuring no introduction of new excise duties which give rise to border formalities; and if he will take steps to publicise them in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those measures introduced by his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Mr. Lee: The Ministry of Defence has continued to encourage small firms to bid for defence contracts and to make realistic proposals and submit tenders even where they have not previously thought of competing. A new edition of the booklet "Selling to the MOD" is in preparation; and steps are being taken to advertise major contracts and invitations to tender at the earliest possible stage to encourage more firms to bid for defence contract and subcontract work. A code of practice on subcontracting has been agreed with the CBI. All these measures are of benefit to small businesses. Further measures are under consideration.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence what further research he intends undertaking into high frequency seismographic verification of nuclear weapons tests.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) by the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement on 3 March 1986 at column 71.

Mr. Canavan asked the Sectetary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to monitor public opinion on the Government's policy on nuclear weapons.

Mr. Stanley: The Ministry of Defence monitors public opinion on nuclear defence and arms control issues by, for example, reference to the results of public opinion polls and to the representations received on these topics. It has not carried out any recent opinion polls on nuclear matters.

Exercise Lionheart

Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has completed his assessment of Exercise Lionheart and of its cost.

Mr. Stanley: I informed the House in October 1984 that I was placing in the Library an unclassified initial assessment of Exercise Lionheart and that I would later make a report on the exercise which would include a statement on its costs.

Detailed analysis of the exercise has not led us to change our immediate impressions. It has provided welcome confirmation that our general planning in crucial areas is soundly based, and no major new factors arose. At the same time, the exercise enabled us to identify weaknesses in a number of areas which are now being addressed by the staffs concerned. There was no doubt about the benefits to be gained from holding an exercise on such a scale, and we aim to hold further such exercises in the future.

The final assessment of the cost to the United Kingdom of Exercise Lionheart is just over £29.5 million, some elements of which would have been incurred even had the exercise not taken place. Details of the costs are as follows:

	£ million
Personnel costs and services	7·1
Stores and supplies	7·3
Movements	9·5
Compensation and miscellaneous	5·6
	29·5

USSR (Nuclear Warheads)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence by what percentage he calculates the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has, over the past five years, increased the number of strategic nuclear warheads operationally deployed at any given time.

Mr. Stanley: On the assumption that all the missiles concerned are MIRV-ed to their maximum capability, the number of Soviet strategic warheads operationally deployed is estimated to have increased by over 20 per cent. in the past five years.

UDR (Form)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of the standard form completed by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment when questioning persons at road blocks checkpoints in Northern Ireland; and if he will place copies of the forms in the Library.

Mr. Stanley: There is no standard form to be completed by soldiers of the UDR or the Regular Army when questioning persons at road blocks or check points in Northern Ireland. However, a standard form is issued for use specifically when a search of a vehicle is made, and a copy has been placed in the Library.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make it his policy to introduce ethnic monitoring into the defence forces; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to announce a decision as to whether or not he intends to introduce ethnic monitoring into the defence forces.

Mr. Freeman: No final decision has been taken on the introduction of ethnic monitoring for the armed forces. Any decision will be announced in due course.

South Africa

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what contacts have been made during the past three years by military attachés from the South African embassy with personnel (a) in his Department and (b) in the defence forces.

Mr. Stanley: During the past three years, South African attachés, as part of organised groups of attachés from other Foreign and Commonwealth countries, have made some 30 visits to defence establishments and attended six defence-related social or ceremonial functions. Also, in November 1983 the air attaché visited the search and rescue establishments at Pitreavie and Bulmer, and in May 1984 the military attaché visited the Army school of physical education. Other contacts with Ministry of Defence or other service personnel are not recorded, but are infrequent.

Merlin Mortar

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the development of the Merlin mortar programme.

Mr. Lee: Merlin originated as a private venture project by British Aerospace to produce an 81 mm terminally-guided anti-tank mortar bomb. The Ministry of Defence subsequently shared with the company funding of work to take the project to a stage where informed decisions could be taken on whether to proceed with full development and subsequent production. Following this work we have concluded that, despite the potential benefits of Merlin, it could not be given sufficient operational priority to find a place in the equipment programme. British Aerospace is aware of this decision.

Corps Airborne Radar

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the reason for the delay in the programme for the corps airborne stand-off radar.

Mr. Lee: Evaluation of the results of the initial studies undertaken during 1984 revealed a number of problems and it took longer than expected to determine how best to proceed. However, proposals have now been made to initiate further studies which are expected to start in the near future.

Buccaneer Aircraft

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to complete the up-date of the Buccaneer aircraft.

Mr. Lee: On present plans the up-date will be completed late in 1989.

SP70 Howitzer

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the SP70 155 mm self-propelled howitzer was originally due to enter service; what is the reason for the delay; and how much the programme is over the original budget.

Mr. Lee: The SP70 155 mm self-propelled howitzer, a collaborative project involving the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy, was originally due to enter service around the beginning of the 1980s. The slippage in the development programme predominantly reflects design changes needed for the equipment to meet the demanding operational requirements. To date the United Kingdom's costs in real terms are just under 50 per cent. above the estimate made when the phase B development began around the end of 1977.

Torpedo Programme

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the Tigerfish heavyweight torpedo was originally due to enter service; what are the reasons for the delay; and how much the programme is over its original budget;

(2) if he will make a statement on the torpedo programme.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

LAW 80 System

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the LAW 80 anti-tank system was due to enter service; what is the reason for the delay; and how much the programme is over its original budget.

Mr. Lee: Delays in the development of LAW 80, which was originally intended to enter service in 1983, stem fundamentally from the changes which had to be introduced during the course of development to enable the system to defeat the likely future tank threat, recently reassessed as containing significant improvements in frontal armour. The technical difficulties of meeting the increased threat proved to be greater than anticipated in a system which still had to remain portable by one man. In addition, there have been a number of management and contractual difficulties. As a result the total development costs of the project have doubled in real terms since the completion of project definition in 1978.

Endeavour Rifle

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence why is the L85A1 Endeavour rifle late entering service.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Offshore Patrol Vessel

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to order a new offshore patrol vessel, OPV III.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my hon. Friend the then Minister on 13 June 1985. OPV III was considered but did not secure a place in the programme and we have no plans at present to proceed any further with this proposal.

CRSP Store Contract

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what developments have taken place in the investigation of Dowty Rotol's management of the CRSP store contract.

The Solicitor-General: I have been asked to reply.

The Director of Public Prosecutions has considered the case relating to the management of Dowty Rotol of the CRSP store, and he has decided that the public interest does not require any further action to be taken.

CIVIL SERVICE

Scientists (Recruitment)

72. Mr. Hayes asked the Minister for the Civil Service what action he is taking to improve the recruitment of scientists into the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: The Civil Service Commission and Departments continue to mount a persistent and sustained recruitment effort to attract scientists into the service. In addition to the recent improvements in scientists' pay, the Treasury is carrying out consultations on substantial improvements in starting salaries for graduates entering the science group with good honours degrees.

Additionally my Department is undertaking a review of the structure of the science group. A major concern will be to devise a structure and career development package to make the science group more attractive.

Secondments

73. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many secondments there were from the Civil Service to outside organisations for the last year for which the information is available; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Luce: In 1985 there were 679 secondments out of the Civil Service of which 229 were to industry and commerce. In 1979 there were 131 secondments to industry and commerce, but no figures are held centrally about secondments to other bodies in that year.

There has been a target of 200 secondments in each direction with industry and commerce since 1977. Despite the difficulties in arranging them, I have recently agreed a new target of 250 secondments out to industry and commerce, to be achieved over the next few years. The target of 200 inward secondments remains.

Performance-related Pay

74. Mr. Powley asked the Minister for the Civil Service what action his Department is taking regarding the introduction of performance-related pay.

Mr. Luce: A performance bonus scheme covering a limited number of grades was introduced last year on an experimental basis. This is planned to run for three years, during which it will be carefully monitored and evaluated. A report on its first year of operation will be available soon.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister also announced on 22 May 1986 that the Government have decided in principle to introduce discretionary pay for grades 2 and 3. The details are currently being worked out, and staff interests will be consulted.

Rayner Reviews (Savings)

75. Mr. Murphy asked the Minister for the Civil Service what have been the total savings in public expenditure to date as a result of the Rayner scrutinies.

Mr. Luce: Cumulative savings of £950 million are attributable to Rayner scrutinies.

Civil Servants (Days Off)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Minister for the Civil Service (1) on what basis civil servants were given the day off on Friday 23 May; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the granting of general days off in addition to normal leave entitlements to civil servants; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list the days normally granted to civil servants as holiday in addition to statutory holidays and their leave entitlements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Her Majesty's Government's policy on Civil Service holidays is the same as that of successive Administrations over many years.

In addition to statutory holidays and annual leave entitlement, civil servants are allowed one day's holiday for the Sovereign's birthday which, by royal decree, is taken whenever possible on the Friday before the spring bank holiday; half a day on Maundy Thursday afternoon; and one other day at the Christmas-new year period. The timing of these holidays may vary in Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 17 June 1986

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bees

Mr. Stern asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to relax regulations in relation to bees.

Mrs. Fenner: No. These regulations were introduced to protect bee health in the United Kingdom. Relaxation of them, particularly of the import controls, could be potentially more damaging to our bee population than the effects of recent bad weather.

Adjurants

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether there is risk to human health when adjurants are mixed with pesticides.

Mrs. Fenner: The pesticides safety precautions scheme (PSPS) requires manufacturers of substances which are intended to be added to pesticides to submit them for pre-marketing scrutiny on the grounds that their properties may be of a nature that alters, to an unacceptable degree, the characteristics of the pesticide formulations to which they are added. This might be by facilitating absorption through human skin or by altering the uptake by crops and fate as residues in food. Clearance is not given if there is evidence of risk to human health from the recommended uses.

Radiation

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the value and amount of food crops destroyed on his instigation arising from the effects of radiation following the Chernobyl disaster.

Mrs. Fenner: Extensive monitoring carried out by my Department has shown levels of radiation following the Chernobyl disaster to be well below those at which any action would need to be considered. We have not therefore instructed any food crops to be destroyed.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Questions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many (a) written and (b) oral questions the Church Commissioners have answered in each of the past 10 Sessions and in the current Session to date.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Commissioners do not have a comprehensive record for the whole of the period in question. However, since 1979, they have answered the following number of questions:

Session	Oral	Written
1979-80	5	3
1980-81	1	1
1981-82	5	16
1982-83	9	8
1983-84	21	28
1984-85	17	19
1985-	26	31

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the Minister of State's reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) on 14 May, Official Report, column 481, what is his Department's estimate of the number of existing jobs in established firms likely to be displaced or threatened by the inward investment decisions notified to the Invest in Britain Bureau in the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department has no estimate of the number of jobs that may have been displaced or threatened as a result of inward investment decisions. However, it places great emphasis on minimising the effects of inward investments on established firms. Failure to attract many of these investors to the United Kingdom could have had a significant effect on British industry placing a large number of jobs in jeopardy.

Radio Spectrum

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to establish and appoint members to a committee to review the allocation of spectrum for defence purposes as recommended in the Merriman report for the independent review of the radio spectrum 30-960 MHz Cmnd. 9000.

Mr. Pattie: Further to my reply of 5 March 1985, at columns 448-49, the allocation of spectrum for defence purposes will be systematically reviewed on a continuing basis by an independent committee, reporting jointly to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Defence and for Trade and Industry. The frequency band 470 MHz-3400 MHz will be the subject of the first stage of the review. The chairman of the defence spectrum review committee for this first stage will be Sir Kenneth Corfield. There will be two other members, Major-General Archibald Birtwistle and Mr. David Withers. It is hoped that the committee will be able to commence its work immediately and will complete the first stage in about 18 months. The first stage of the defence spectrum will run concurrently with a more general review of the allocations within the same frequency range. A joint report covering both reviews will be published.

SCOTLAND

Dornoch Firth (Rail Bridge)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from ScotRail that he should make a grant under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968 to enable a rail bridge across the Dornoch firth and re-routed line to be constructed when the Dornoch firth road crossing is begun; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Ancram: I have nothing to add to the reply which the hon. Member has had today from my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport.

National Performing Arts Companies (Grants)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities about grant-aid to national performing arts companies for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Last year, in response to joint representations from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Scottish Arts Council, my right hon. and learned Friend provided £600,000 as continuing support for their arrangements for funding the Scottish national companies.

Urban Aid Programme

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from Lothian regional council about the number of projects approved under the 1986-87 urban aid programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Lothian regional council wrote to the Scottish Development Department on 10 June expressing disappointment at the number of projects approved under the urban programme for a start in 1986-87. Th council has also written to all Members of Parliament in Lothian urging that they press the Secretary of State to reconsider the decisions on the council's applications. A meeting between officials is likely to take place in early July.

Edinburgh (Bypass)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the latest estimated completion date for Edinburgh's outer city bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: This project is the responsibility of Lothian regional council. I understand that, subject to completion of the necessary planning and other statutory procedures, the council hopes to complete work on the remaining sections of the bypass by the end of the decade.

Housing

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many houses it is estimated will be constructed or improved as a result of the scheme whereby local authorities can transfer funds from Block B to the Housing Corporation.

Mr. Ancram: It is for local authorities which wish to take advantage of the option to transfer resources from their non-HRA allocations to the Housing Corporation to seek the agreement of the Scottish Development Department. Any such applications will be carefully considered. I cannot predict how many authorities will seek to transfer funds or on what scale.

Forestry

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to provide financial assistance to roads authorities to maintain and upgrade specific rural roads essential to the development of forestry.

Mr. Ancram: I shall take such work into account in determining capital allocations, if authorities include it in their roads and transport capital programmes. Financial assistance may be available under the provisions of the Industrial Development Act 1982, where the proposed work is located within an assisted area.

Ancient Monuments (Forestry Schemes)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to seek to increase the protection afforded to ancient monuments and historic sites which are exposed to Forestry Commission or other private forestry plantation programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979 affords protection to ancient monuments of national importance through the process of scheduling. My right hon. and learned Friend can see no need to increase this statutory protection. In addition, the Forestry Commission has for many years liaised closely with officials over forestry developments which might have implications for archaeology, and my right hon. and learned Friend is aware that foresters in both the public and private sectors are conscious of the potential impact of afforestation on the archaeological heritage. My right hon. and learned Friend is, however, concerned to see that there should be the most appropriate machinery for consultation and appropriate action in present conditions to minimise inadvertent damage to ancient monuments. Officials are in active discussion with Forestry Commission staff to this end.

Countryside Commission

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the level of funding of the Countryside Commission for Scotland in 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86; and what level of funding is planned for 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: The level of funding made available to the Countryside Commission for Scotland has been as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	4·1
1983-84	4·4
1984-85	4·5
1985-86	4·7

Provision has been made in the Supply Estimates for funding of just over £5 million in respect of the commission's planned expenditure in 1986-87.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many sites of special scientific interest have been designated to date in Scotland; and what percentage of the land area of Scotland they comprise.

Mr. Rifkind: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that as of 30 April 1986 there were 1,083 sites of special scientific interest covering 8 per cent. of land within Scotland.

Electricity Boards

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has yet agreed a new financial target and performance aims for the Scottish electricity boards.

Mr. Rifkind: Cost reduction performance aims for the Scottish electricity boards were agreed for the three-years period to March 1986. After consultation with the boards I have decided to extend the period of the aims to March 1987, making appropriate adjustments to reflect the further costs reduction which can be expected in the additional year. The revised aim for generation and transmission activities is for the boards jointly to reduce controllable unit costs in real terms by 4·2 per cent. over the four-year period 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1987. Over the same period the South of Scotland Electricity Board will aim to reduce its controllable unit costs of distribution in real terms by 10 per cent. and similarly the North of Scotland Hydro Electric Board will seek to reduce this element of its costs by 5·5 per cent.

The joint financial target agreed with the boards for the period 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1986 was to make an average return of 1·75 per cent. on net assets valued on a current cost basis. The average return achieved by the boards was 2·23 per cent. I have now agreed a one year joint financial target with the boards of 2·7 per cent. for the financial year 1986-87.

TRANSPORT

Dornoch Firth (Rail Bridge)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport what detailed case has been put to him by British Rail in support of the request for special funding to enable a rail bridge across the Dornoch firth and re-routed line to be constructed when the Dornoch firth road crossing is begun; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. David Mitchell: None. I under that British Rail has been considering the case for a rail crossing of the Dornoch firth and has had discussions with the Scottish Office and various interested bodies. It has concluded that it cannot make a financial case for funding the scheme wholly themselves; nor can it show that sufficient additional funding would be available from other sources. Accordingly, the Railways Board is not proceeding with its proposal.

Roads (Expenditure)

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the comparable figures for capital spending on the national roads programme expressed in real terms for 1979-80 and 1986-87; and what percentage increase this represents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures are as follows:

	£ million cash	*Real terms
1979-80	402	611
1986-87	813	741†

* 1984-85 prices.
† Plus 21 per cent.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the Government have any independent forecasts of traffic in order to validate their assessment of the effects of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: As part of its assessment of the four competing Channel fixed link schemes, the Government carried out independent appraisals of the promoters' traffic forecasts. These are not to be published, for the reasons set out in the Government White Paper, Cmnd. 9735.

British Rail (Employees)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are now employed by British Rail on railway operating duties; and how this compares with 1978.

Mr. David Mitchell: The following information is provided in "Transport Statistics in Great Britain 1974-84" (table 3.8):

British Rail: Staff at end of year

Alternative breakdowns of this information are a management matter for the British Railways Board.

BR (Timekeeping)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 17 March, Official Report, column 26, he will now provide a breakdown by region of British Rail's punctuality for both express and non-express services for the financial year 1985-86.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that the information requested is as follows:

		Trains arriving on time	Trains arriving on time or less than 5 minutes late
		Per cent.	Per cent.
Eastern Region	Class I	52	71
	Class II	73	90
London Midland Region	Class I	53	68
	Class II	77	88
Western Region	Class I	60	77
	Class II	72	90
Southern Region	Class I	65	85
	Class II	75	93
Scottish Region	Class I	65	77
	Class II	89	93
Weighted Totals	Class I	60	77
	Class II	77	91

Class I trains include all inter-city services, Scottish express services and some longer distance provincial and London and south-east sector services.

Class II services comprise all other passenger services.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he receives from British Rail on train punctuality as a matter of course (a) on full journeys and (b) relating to intermediate stations; what is the frequency with which this information is supplied; and what other information his Department has requested on train punctuality from British Rail in the last 12 months.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend receives quarterly reports from the British Railways Board on train punctuality for full journeys, by region; and by class—that is whether express or not. He receives no information relating to intermediate stations. In future the Railways Board will also be providing information on a sector basis to permit monitoring against the sector-wide standards set. Any additional information requested during the last 12 months has been on a purely ad hoc basis as available.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the standard of train punctuality in the London Midland region.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Consumer Association on train punctuality on the London Midland region; and what action he intends to take.

Mr. David Mitchell: None, though I am aware of comments the association has made.

WALES

Housing (Senior Management)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what conclusions he has reached following his consultations on the draft circular "Housing for Senior Management."

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The consultations revealed considerable support for my view that a pool of houses attractive to and suitable for senior management is an important inducement for business men and industrialists considering investment in Wales and that where such a pool does not exist permission for some new sites should be made available. There was a division of opinion on the degree of need for new sites but it was generally felt that where they were needed they should be on the outskirts of towns and villages rather than in the open countryside. I continue to believe that an adequate pool of suitable houses does not exist everywhere it is needed in Wales and that there must be such a pool of houses or sites for new houses in each locality which seeks to attract incoming business or industry. I accept that this need varies from place to place and that it ought not to be met in the open countryside. I have concluded that the best way to ensure that the need is properly assessed and met is for each local planning authority to review its policies on the control of development with the object of introducing sufficient flexibility into its strategy on developments in and adjoining towns and villages to permit additional sites for single new houses or low density groups of houses so as to ensure that there is the pool of houses and sites for houses necessary for the encouragement of new commerce and industry. I am therefore asking authorities to undertake this review, to discuss it with representatives of industry, business, house builders and land owners, and to report the results to me by 30 November 1986.

It was a criticism of the draft circular that it appeared to suggest that permission for new houses given in response to the policy of providing for the needs of senior management should be related expressly to the needs of individuals or of specific groups of people and that this was a significant departure from the generally accepted policy that planning decisions should be related to the use of land rather than the identity of characteristics of the user. I make it clear that this is not my intention. The need is for incoming senior managers to be able to make their choice of house from a range of suitable property and my object is to ensure that enough houses or sites are likely to be available to meet their needs.

I have today issued a circular indicating my view of the general policy requirement and asking for the local reviews to be carried out. The circular also asks for care to be exercised to ensure that existing attractive residential areas are not spoilt by insensitive infilling.

A copy of the circular has been placed in the Library. I have also arranged for a copy to be sent to my hon. Friend and to all other right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies in Wales.

Planning Permissions

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications for the revocation of planning permissions under section 45 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 have been made to him in each year since 1979; and how many of these have been approved, how many rejected and how many are pending.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Since 1979 one revocation order has been submitted to the Secretary of State for confirmation pursuant to section 45. This was submitted in 1982 and was confirmed in 1983. In addition the Secretary of State has issued directions under section 46 of the Act requiring five revocation orders to be submitted to him for confirmation. Details are as follows:

	Confirmed	Not Confirmed
1980	1	1
1981	1	—
1982	—	—
1983	1	—
1984	—	—

Patient Statistics

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table for each of the health authorities in Wales showing the numbers of in, out and day patients treated against each authority's financial allocation in the latest year for which complete figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information given in the following table relates to the financial year 1984-85.

Health Authority	In-patient cases	Total out-patient* attendances	Day Case attendances	Financial allocation £ million
Clwyd	57,320	425,615	5,744	71·281

* Including accident and emergency.

NHS Managers (Objectives)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what objectives are set for managers in the National Health Service in Wales; what monitoring there is to measure achievement against objectives; and what action is taken consequent to that monitoring.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 28 April 1986, at column 287.

Rural Schools

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what study he is making of the essential maintenance needs of rural schools in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None. As owners of the schools it is for the local education authorities to identify essential maintenance needs.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to meet members of the National Farmers Union and the Farmers Union of Wales to discuss the possibility of designation of the whole of Wales as a less favoured area within the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have no plans to meet the National Farmers Union or the Farmers Union of Wales to discuss the less-favoured areas in Wales.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many sites of special scientific interest have been designated to date in Wales; and what percentage of the land area of the Principality they comprise.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: At 30 April there were 647 sites of special scientific interest in Wales, covering some 8 per cent. of the Principality.

University College, Swansea

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will receive a deputation from University college, Swansea, led by the right hon. Member from Swansea, West, to discuss the particular problems posed for the college and for the city of Swansea by the recently announced cuts in funding for the college.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Responsibility for funding the colleges of the University of Wales rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the University Grants Committee. University college, Swansea will have opportunities for discussing with the UGC any problems which it faces following the announcement of its recurrent grant allocation for 1986-87. I do not believe it would be appropriate for me to hold separate discussions about the allocations of recurrent grant with the colleges of the University of Wales.

EMPLOYMENT

Co-operatives

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate of the average annual rate of growth of employment in firms registered under the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976 during the period November 1976 to 31 March 1986.

Mr. Trippier: The certification of co-operative and common ownership enterprises under the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976 ceased on 21 November 1981 when the financial provisions of the Act expired. Certification was for the purpose of identifying potential recipients of loans under the Act. No information is available on growth of employment in those enterprises certified under the Act between 1976 and 1981.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General if he will provide an estimate of the number of people who are currently employed in worker co-operatives in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: It is estimated that there are around 12,000 people currently employed in worker co-operatives in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate of the number of jobs that have been created in worker co-operatives in the United Kingdom since the passing of the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that there is no sufficient data available on worker co-operatives to make an assessment of job creation over the period in question. However, in 1980 there were 305 worker co-operatives employing 5,342 people compared to around 1,400 co-operatives employing about 12,000 people currently.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the survival rate of (a) new start worker co-operatives and (b) traditional forms of small business new starts.

Mr. Trippier: (a) No information is available on new start worker co-operatives, but the Co-operative Development Agency estimates that in any one year 90 per cent. of the total stock of worker co-operatives will survive.

(b) A rough measure of the survival rate of conventional small businesses is that after 10 years well over one half of all businesses can be expected to be in operation. Full details of the lifespan of businesses were published in British Business on 12 August 1983. A copy of the article was placed in the Library.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Paymaster General what is the percentage of YTS trainees who obtain full-time employment (a) nationally and (b) in the West Hertfordshire constituency.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a monthly follow-up survey of all young people leaving YTS. The latest results, covering those who left YTS between 1 April and 31 December 1985, show that 53 per cent. were in full-time work some three months after leaving YTS. A further 4 per cent. were in part-time work.

Information about YTS leavers in the West Hertfordshire constituency is not available. However, latest results for the Dacorum local authority district, which forms a significant proportion of the constituency, show that 71 per cent. of YTS leavers were in full-time work and a further 3 per cent. were in part-time work.

TVEI (West Hertfordshire)

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Paymaster General what technical and vocational initiative proposals he has approved for the West Hertfordshire constituency.

Mr. Trippier: No proposal for a technical and vocational education initiative project has been approved for the West Hertfordshire constituency.

It is for each participating authority to decide where to site its TVEI pilot project; the Hertfordshire project is based in Stevenage.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Lang: In the 1983-84 Session two different Ministers and four different officials gave evidence; in 1984-85, four different Ministers and 14 different officials did so.

Youth Employment

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General what plans he has for the employment of young people in Yorkshire.

Mr. Trippier: Employment prospects for young people in Yorkshire depend on a sustained improvement in the performance of industry, business and the economy as a whole. Our economic policies are designed to create the conditions for that improvement and we are making substantial progress. We also need levels of pay which ensure the competitiveness of our industry.

In 1986-87 two-year YTS will provide 37,940 places in Yorkshire and Humberside region, with a further 8,715 continuation places being provided for young people who entered training last year. The job prospects of those completing YTS and those ineligible for training will be further enhanced by the new workers scheme.

Those young people who have been unemployed for some time will be able to benefit from temporary employment under the community programme. At April 1986, 26,150 places were available in Yorkshire and Humberside region and the target is to increase this figure to 28,900 places by October this year. Our other employment measures will also directly or indirectly benefit young people.

Civil Servants (Official Contacts)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Paymaster General what consultations he has had with Civil Service unions about trade unions and firms approaching named civil servants in his Department on official business.

Mr. Trippier: There has to date been no consultation with Civil Service unions within my Department on this issue. Nor has there been any request from these unions for such discussions. I would refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend's previous reply on this subject during the statement on business deregulation on 22 May 1986, at column 549.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Meacher asked the Paymaster General what was the number of unemployed claimants for the latest available year (a) nationally and (b) in Bradford, West.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. On 8 May 1986 the numbers of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom and the Bradford, West parliamentary constituency were 3,270,892 and 8,703 respectively.

Monthly Inflation Index

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General when the factors used to calculate the monthly inflation index were last reviewed.

Mr. Lang: The method of compilation of the general index of retail prices is reviewed from time to time by the Retail Prices Index Advisory Committee, which last reported in 1977. My right hon. and noble Friend expects to receive shortly a report from this committee and will be ready to consider making changes to the present methodolgy in the light of its recommendations.

The "weights" used to combine the price movements of the various components of the index are revised as a matter of routine at the beginning of each year and data sources are changed when necessary to take account of changing circumstances.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. A. T. Hoolahan QC

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Attorney-General on which dates in September and October 1984 Mr. A. T. Hoolahan QC sat on the north-eastern circuit as a deputy high court judge.

The Solicitor-General: Mr. Hoolahan sat as a deputy High Court judge on the north-eastern circuit on all working days between 8 and 16 October 1984 inclusive. There is no record of his sitting at all in September 1984 in this capacity.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Salt 2

38. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on representations made by Her Majesty's Government to the United States Administration on their decision to breach the terms of Salt 2.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 12 June at column 286.

USSR (Baptist Christians)

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have raised the plight of Baptist Christians in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the treatment of one of its members, Serafima Yudinsteva, with the Soviet authorities in the context of the Helsinki final act.

Mr. Renton: We take every suitable opportunity to raise with the Soviet authorities human rights issues, including freedom of religion and belief, both bilaterally and within the CSCE framework. But it is not possible, on any one occasion, to raise more than a few of the many hundreds of cases brought to our attention. I shall bear the hon. Member's point in mind when considering future representations.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Eggar: The following table gives the number of appearances of officials and Ministers from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Overseas Development Agency before House of Commons Select Committees in each of the parliamentary Sessions 1983-84 and 1984-85.

	1983-84	1984-85

NATIONAL FINANCE

Own Resources

Dr. Twinn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the early payment of non value added tax own resources to the European Community in June.

Mr. Brooke: In accordance with article 10(2) of Council Regulation 2891/77, the Commission has again invited member states to advance the payment of own resources other than VAT in respect of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties collected by the Government on its behalf.

In accordance with this request, the Government propose to make an advance payment of some £118 million on 20 June. This will be financed initially by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund, pending parliamentary approval of the estimate presented to the House on 17 June. The payment of levies and duties on the due date of 20 June will be reduced by the amount of the advance. There will therefore be no net addition to public expenditure.

Freeports

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn of 3 June, Official Report, column 470-1, what customs and excise duty reliefs are presently available in United Kingdom freeports; if he will make an order exempting supplies made within the United Kingdom freeports from domestic value added tax and enabling excise goods to be stored without payment of duty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Customs duty is not charged on goods imported from third countries which are placed in freeports for storage or for processing prior to exportation from the Community. Unless an excise warehouse has been approved in a freeport, excise duty reliefs are limited to those which may be allowed under the Customs and Excise Acts.

The application of domestic VAT in freeports is to be reviewed by Customs and Excise. I shall await the outcome of the review before considering any order exempting the supplies made in freeports from this tax. As to excise duty, excise goods may be stored in freeports without payment of duty in excise warehouses; such warehouses need to be approved under the normal criteria by Customs and Excise.

Excise Duty

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the European and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, harmonisation of the structure of excise duties on alcoholic drinks; and if he will take steps to publicise these proposals in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: The Council of Ministers last discussed the harmonisation of the structure of the excise duties on alcoholic drinks in 1981. The Government consider that the proposed directives would need some amendment before they were acceptable to the United Kingdom. The draft directives have been subject to parliamentary scrutiny and relevant trade interests have been widely consulted. No further special publicity measures are considered necessary.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, a proposal concerning the harmonisation of the structure of excise on mineral oils; and if he will take steps to publicise it in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: A proposal for a directive was issued by the Commission in 1973 but has never been discussed by the Council of Ministers. The Government consider that the draft would require a number of changes to bring it up to date and to make it acceptable to the United Kingdom. The proposal has been the subject of parliamentary scrutiny and of extensive discussion with trade interests in the past. No further special publicity measures are considered necessary.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, proposals for a Council decision providing for a stand-still ensuring no introduction of new excise duties which give rise to border formalities; and if he will take steps to publicise them in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: The Government consider that this proposal is closely linked to the general question of indirect tax approximation which is currently under consideration in the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers. The Government's view is that it would not be appropriate for the Council to take a decision on this draft directive until its position on the wider issue had been settled.

The process of parliamentary scrutiny has begun; the proposal has stimulated a number of representations from interested trade bodies. No special publicity measures are considered necessary.

DEFENCE

Royal Ordnance plc

18. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total value of current Ministry of Defence contracts with Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Younger: It is not our practice on commercial sensitivity grounds to reveal the total value of our business with individual contractors. I should like to take this opportunity to inform the House that, although substantial progress has been made in the process of transforming Royal Ordnance into a fully fledged commercial entity, it has not been possible to take this far enough and to have in place all the features necessary to provide the basis for a successful flotation this summer. Privatisation remains the Government's objective and further consideration will be given to the means of achieving this.

Trident

12. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the number of jobs that will be created by the Trident programme in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The Ministry of Defence employs some 4,500 civilians at Rosyth, Coulport and Faslane in support of strategic systems. Cancellation of the Trident project would put these jobs at risk. During the peak years of the Trident programme over 2,000 construction jobs will be created on the Clyde; and equipment purchases for Trident will create around 25,000 direct and indirect job opportunities in the United Kingdom as a whole, of which Scotland will take a share.

Defence Contracts (Regional Aid)

17. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the awarding of defence contracts is used as an adjunct of regional industrial aid.

Mr. Lee: The primary objective of defence procurement is to satisfy the essential requirements of the services and in a way that secures best value for money for the taxpayer. Close links are maintained with the Department of Trade and Industry on the regional implications of equipment programmes.

501st Tactical Missile Wing, Greenham Common

19. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the deployment exercises of the 501st Tactical Missile Wing at Greenham Common.

Mr. Stanley: We do not give details of training exercises conducted by nuclear missile units.

Chemical Weapons

20. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long Her Majesty's Government envisage it would take to transport sufficient quantity of binary chemical weapons to Europe from the United States of America in a time of crisis.

Mr. Stanley: Detailed arrangements would be a matter for the United States, but timing would be of course largely depend on the priority of the task in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time.

23. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any consultations have taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom on a draft plan for the deployment of United States binary munitions in the United Kingdom in a time of crisis.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 3 June, at columns 428-29.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence what study his Department has made of the strategic options available to him in the event of Soviet use of battlefield chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The essence of NATO's strategy of deterrence and flexible response is that NATO maintains a range of possible responses to aggression in any form against any NATO country. There would therefore be a range of possible responses to the use of chemical weapons against NATO by the Soviet Union.

Northern Ireland

21. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the operation of the security forces in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stanley: Military operations are being carried out, in support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary's fight against terrorism, by the Royal Navy, Army and Royal Air Force. The Army element currently comprises 10 Regular battalions and 9 battalions of the Ulster Defence Regiment. A major contribution is also being made by various support elements, including the Royal Engineers.

Salt 2

22. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has had any recent discussions with other Northern Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers about President Reagan's decision to abrogate the Salt 2 treaty.

Mr. Younger: I keep in close touch with my NATO colleagues on a wide variety of issues, and we are agreed on the importance of compliance with existing treaties. The Government hope that the Soviet Union will respond constructively to United States concerns over their compliance record and that both sides will continue to observe the SALT 2 agreement.

29. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom defence policy of the decision of the United States Government to cease abiding by Salt 2.

Mr. Younger: The search for balanced and verifiable arms control agreements forms a central element of the Government's security policy, but they can only contribute to international stability if all sides have confidence that they are being complied with. We have welcomed the President's decision to dismantle two Poseidon submarines in order to stay within SALT limits now. We hope that the Soviet Union will respond constructively to United States concerns over its compliance record, and that both sides will continue to observe the agreement.

South Atlantic

25. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future role of the armed forces in the south Atlantic.

Mr. Stanley: The garrison in the Falklands reflects the continuing need for a military presence sufficient to deter aggression and to defend the islands against attack.

Nimrod Airborne Radar Programme

8. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has had any recent discussions with General Electric Company Avionics about the Nimrod airborne early warning programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile).

Type 23 Frigate

24. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the placing of orders for type 23 frigates.

31. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce orders for further type 23 frigates; and if he will make a statement.

32. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the number of frigates to be ordered by his Department in 1986-87.

Mr. Lee: Negotiations with Swan Hunter Shipbuilders for the second type 23 frigate are continuing. "Best and final" offers from the four firms competing for follow-on frigates are currently being evaluated. No decisions have yet been taken on the size and timing of orders.

Officers (Resignations)

26. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Defence what action he intends to take regarding the number of officers leaving the services.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 513 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986, Volume One" (Cmnd. 9763-1).

Crown Proceedings Act 1947

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the repeal of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the operation of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Freeman: Representations continue to be received from the categories of people referred to in the reply from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 20 February 1986, at column 326. In addition, a few representations have been received from currently serving members of the armed forces.

27. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now take steps to seek to repeal section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act.

37. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to complete his review of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a statement on his review of the working of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 as it affects his Department.

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made towards the completion of the latest review of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947; what is the envisaged time scale towards its completion; and if he has any interim proposals regarding the future of section 10 of the Act.

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy in relation to section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act.

Mr. Freeman: Our review of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act is well advanced and, while I cannot set a firm date for its completion, we are getting on with it as quickly as possible. This is a complex and difficult subject and I would not want to prejudge the outcome by making any interim proposals.

Mr. Jim Smith and Aish and Company

28. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received on the question of Mr. Jim Smith and Aish and company in the light of the report on the subject by the Committee of Public Accounts.

Mr. Lee: None.

Strategic Defence Initiative

30. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the progress made towards assisting British participation in strategic defence initiative research.

Mr. Lee: Following signature on 6 December 1985 of the US/UK Memorandum of Understanding on United Kingdom participation in the United States SDI research programme, a United Kingdom SDI participation office was set up in the Ministry of Defence with as its main task the provision of assistance to British firms and research organisations seeking involvement in the programme.

To this end, the SDI PO, working closely with the British embassy, Washington, and the United States SDI organisation in the United States Department of Defence, has built up and is now further developing a detailed knowledge of the content and direction of the United States research programme; is helping to identify bidding opportunities for British firms and research organisations; and is advising them on the terms anc conditions for United Kingdom participation set out in the MoU and supporting administrative arrangements. Large-scale briefings on these matters were given in mid-February and mid-March to a total of some 200 British firms and research organisations, and a further briefing was given in late March in Washington DC to a large audience of United States and United Kingdom industrialists and United States contracting officials. More specialised briefings are given to individual firms and research organisations, both UK and US, virtually every day.

Written guidelines on participation have now been circulated to British firms and research organisations; and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Negotiations are at a very advanced stage between the United States and United Kingdom Governments on a US-funded European architecture study. Other business arrangements are in various stages of negotiation, across a broad spectrum of research topics.

36. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the total value of the strategic defence initiative orders won by United Kingdom firms.

Mr. Lee: US$1·2 million.

Battlefield Nuclear Systems

33. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects that the first decision on the modernisation of individual battlefield nuclear systems will be made.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) on 20 January at columns 90-91 and to the communiqué of the NATO Nuclear Planning Group meeting of 21 March, a copy of which is in the Library.

RAF Cottesmore (Noise Nuisance)

34. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on progress regarding the proposed new survey of noise nuisance experienced by residents living near RAF Cottesmore.

Mr. Freeman: Arrangements have been made for a team from the RAF Institute of Community and Occupational Medicine to take further noise tests from 23 to 27 June at sites which have been carefully selected in conjunction with the chief environmental health officers of Rutland district council and South Kesteven district council. Monitoring equipment is already in place at the villages of Cottesmore and Ashwell.

Defence Policy

35. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his recent proposals to publicise the Government's defence policy.

Mr. Stanley: The Government will take as many opportunities as they can to explain the good sense and responsibility of their defence policies and to expose the naivity and irresponsibility of some alternatives being proposed to it.

Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the number of SS24 and SS25 intercontinental ballistic missiles deployed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Stanley: Our assessment is that so far some 70 SS25 ICBMs are deployed in the Soviet Union. Deployment of the SSX24 has not yet begun.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many missiles were delivered to Greenham common on 9 and 21 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 9 June at column 60.

RAF Brawdy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if RAF Brawdy was on armed alert at any time during or immediately after the United States air force attack on Libya.

Mr. Stanley: Following the United States action against specific terrorist-related targets in Libya on 14 and 15 April, all Ministry of Defence establishments in Great Britain including RAF Brawdy were placed on an increased security alert state.

Defence Projects

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Defence what projects have been either partly or wholly financed by his Department since 1979 which have resulted in work being placed in Avon's aerospace factories; and what were the sums involved.

Mr. Lee: The detailed information requested is not available. However, among the major aerospace contractors which have factories in Avon are British Aerospace and Rolls-Royce. A prime responsibility of the Bristol division of British Aerospace is ship-launched missile systems including the Seawolf ship self-defence anti-missile system, the Sea Dart long range anti-aircraft missile system and the Sea Skua anti-ship missile. The Bristol division of Rolls-Royce numbers among its products the engines for the Tornado and Harrier aircraft. Both divisions were paid over £100 million by my Department in 1984-85.

Departmental Land

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will specify the whereabouts of the land owned and leased by his Department and the land over which his Department has rights in Wales.

ENVIRONMENT

Nuclear Fuel (Reprocessing)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of any technical reports produced by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Board or British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. which conclude in favour of reprocessing spent Magnox nuclear fuel on the ground of environmental safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No technical reports specifically addressing the environmental safety of reprocessing spent Magnox fuel are available. My Department commissioned report DOE/RW/83.086 which reviews the environmental aspects of reprocessing oxide fuel. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer from the hon. Member for Mitcham and Mordern (Mrs. Rumbold) on 19 May to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, he will publish any economic models used by his Department in forecasting or assessing local government expenditure, spending targets, or rate limits, during the last two full financial years.

Mrs. Rumbold: A description of the economic model referred to in my answer of 19 May has now been published in the journal "Environment and Planning C: Government and Policy, 1986, volume 4, pages 145-153." I have today placed an offprint of this article in the Library.

Water Fittings and Pipes

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to establish a system of spot checks at sales outlets for water fittings and pipes to ensure that such products comply with British Safety Standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. I have no proposal to place an additional burden of inspection on sales outlets for water fittings and pipes.

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to confer upon water authorities the power of entry to domestic and commercial premises to carry out inspections designed to ensure that water fittings and pipes in use are suitable for low pressure systems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. Water authorities have powers of entry on to premises to examine water pipes and fittings to ensure that water they supply is not wasted, misused, unduly consumed or contaminated before use. It is for the consumer to assure himself that his pipes and fittings are suitable for his purposes.

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to place a statutory requirement on water authorities to use only pipes and fittings made to British Safety Standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. Water authorities have procurement policies formulated to secure best value for money. I am advised that wherever practicable water authorities purchase pipes and fittings manufactured to British Standard or equivalent specification.

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what checks are carried out to ensure that water fittings on sale in the United Kingdom conform to British Safety Standards.

Mr. John Patten: It is for the purchaser to assure himself that water fittings offered for sale are of an adequate standard. However water undertakers have powers to enter premises and check whether such fittings are adequate to comply with any byelaws made by them to prevent the waste, misuse, undue consumption or contamination of water. Undertakers also have powers to alter, repair or replace defective fittings at the consumer's expense.

Calderdale

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total level of assistance administered by his Department including urban programme funds, derelict land grant and so on, which has been spent in the Calderdale metropolitan borough area in each year since 1974.

Sir George Young: The total level of assistance to the Calderdale Metropolitan Borough area since 1974 through specific grants administered by the Department of the Environment is shown, where available, in the table. The figures exclude assistance through main programmes and related subsidies and grants.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Ridley: The information is as follows:

Evidence given to Departmental Select Committees by Officials and Ministers from the Department of the Environment, 1983-84 and 1984-85

	Session 1983-84	Session 1984-85
Number of officials*	36	32
Number of Ministers	2	3

* In these figures, each appearance by an official is counted separately. Appearances before non-Departmental Select Committees are excluded.

Homelessness

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to meet representatives of Shelter, Shelter Housing Aid Centre and the Campaign for the Homeless and Rootless to discuss Government policy towards the reduction of homelessness; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction and I are in contact with these bodies when appropriate, as are my officials. I have no plans at present for a meeting at Ministerial level.

Management Agreements

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now publish the report by Laurence Gould Consultants Limited on the operation of the financial guidelines for management agreements under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes, it has always been our intention to publish this report. We had planned to do so at the same time as we were able to announce our preliminary conclusions on it. This entails a great deal of detailed work and technical consideration. We had made clear before some recent misconceived press comment that we expect to publish the report, and our observations, so we could consult appropriately. In the light, however, of the press comment I have decided it would be right to publish the Gould report forthwith. The Government intend to consult shortly both on the report and on its own preliminary conclusions.

British Geological Survey

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures to show the level of his Department's funding of the British Geological Survey in each of the past 10 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department's level of funding of the British Geological Survey in each of the last 10 years is given in the table.

DOE expenditure with British Geological Survey for last 10 years
Cash terms in £ million

1976-77	2·574

1978-79	3·088

Countryside Commission

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the level of Government funding of the Countryside Commission in each of the past four financial years and in the present financial year; and what level of funding is planned for 1986-87.

Mrs. Rumbold: Grant-in-aid to the Countryside Commission since 1 April 1982 has been as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	11·2
1983-84	12·5
1984-85	13·0
1985-86	15·3
1986-87	*17·7

* Planned.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sites of special scientific interest exist at present in England; and what percentage of the land area of England they comprise.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that as at 30 April 1986 there were 3,156 sites of special scientific interest covering about 5 per cent. of land within England.

Wildlife (Imports)

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his policy with regard to the issue of further licences under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for the import of exotic wildlife in cases where the applicant has previously failed to comply with the conditions imposed on such a licence;

(2) what is his policy with regard to the issue of licences under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for the importation of exotic wildlife in cases where the applicant is known to have been convicted for offences under the Act or for any other offences which may be relevant to his suitability to hold a licence.

Mrs. Rumbold: Licences for the import of endangered species (both fauna and flora) are issued under European Council Regulation 3626/82 (which implements the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora within the European Community) and under the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976.

Each application for a licence is considered on its merits, taking account of all relevant factors and circumstances. Failure on the part of an applicant to comply with the conditions of a previous licence, or a conviction for offences under import or other relevant legislation, would certainly be regarded as a relevant factor to be considered if further applications for import licences in respect of endangered species are received.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 4 June, how many of the parking fines in 1985 were incurred on the occasion of official lunch-time engagements by Ministers; and if he will list them by Department.

Sir George Young: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number and size, in terms of bedrooms and type, of residential units sold for under £40,000 on land owned by the London Docklands Development Corporation for each financial year up to March 1986.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986 c. 19]: The total number of homes sold for under £40,000 on LDDC-owned land for each financial year since July 1981 is as follows:

	Numbers
1981-82	2
1982-83	399
1983-84	431
1984-85	519
1985-86	543

These figures do not include sales to housing associations, or housing reserved but not yet sold. LDDC records do not provide a breakdown in terms of the bedrooms, sizes or types of these homes.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps have been taken by his Department to monitor the radiation levels of waste rubble and steel from a demolished uranium enrichment building at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, Capenhurst currently being tipped at the Mount tip, Buckley, Clwyd; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what monitoring has been carried out by the Radiochemical Inspectorate of radioactivity in concrete rubble and steel waste from the demolished uranium enrichment plant at British Nuclear Fuels Limited, Capenhurst currently being tipped at Mount tip, Buckley, Clwyd; if he will publish the results of such monitoring; what steps the Inspectorate takes to monitor radioactivity levels at the point of disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 12 June 1986]: Wastes consisting of concrete rubble and some reinforcing steel are arising from the demolition of the floor of a redundant building at Capenhurst which used to house part of the old uranium enrichment plant.

Prior to demolition, BNFL was required by the Radiochemical Inspectorate of my Department to carry out detailed and systematic monitoring of all materials for disposal. Some small areas of contaminated concrete were found, and disposed of, under an authorised route. None of the wastes being deposited at the Mount tip, Buckley, Clwyd is considered to be radioactive within the meaning of the Radioactive Substances Act 1960. The Radiochemical Inspectorate confirmed the validity of these measurements by independent monitoring and the measurements demonstate that the levels recorded are consistent with that expected for naturally occurring radioactivity in concrete.

Because the wastes have been demonstrated to be non-radioactive within the meaning of the 1960 Act, subsequent disposals are not subject to the provisions of this Act and therefore the Radiochemical Inspectorate has no cause to monitor at the point of disposal. However the Alyn and Deeside district council and the Welsh Water Authority are aware of these disposals and are monitoring the situation under their powers.

Water (Privatised Companies)

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, what discussions he has had with the European Commission as to the extent to which the proposed water services plcs will be accepted as competent authorities for the purpose of the relevant EEC directives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: My Department has discussed our proposals for privatising the water industry with the Commission. We have no grounds for believing that water services plcs would not be accepted as competent authorities for the relevant purposes.

Caretaker Projects, Birmingham

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why his Department has turned down new area caretaker projects in Handsworth, Birmingham.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: The concept of area caretakers has now been established in Birmingham for over 10 years during which time the inner city partnership has supported 24 projects, five of which have been in Handsworth. However, the concept can no longer be considered experimental or new; and in 1985 it was agreed between my Department and Birmingham city council that the local authority's main programme was a more appropriate source of long-term, secure funding. It is for the city of Birmingham, through it's own resources or those of other sponsors, to fund further area caretaker schemes.

Non-payment of water charges

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes had their own water supplies cut off by water authorities in 1985; and for how long, in each year from 1979 to 1986 and to the latest date available.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: The number of disconnections by water authorities in England for non-payment of water charges is given below for financial years 1979-80 to 1985-86. Information on disconnections for other reasons, and on the duration of disconnections, is not available. Separate information for households is not available before 1983-84.

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86

Lower Leigh, Churchstow

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for how long his Department has been working on the buildings at Lower Leigh, Churchstow, near Kingsbridge, Devon; what work is being done; what is the estimated cost of repair; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The medieval timber buildings at Lower Leigh were acquired by my Department in 1975, but are now the responsibility of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. A programme of consolidation and repair is due to be completed by 1990 at a total cost of £350,000.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 50 most deprived housing authorities as measured by his Department using the housing "Z" score, giving the figure for each authority.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 19 May 1986, c. 82]: The 50 authorities with the highest housing Z scores are shown in the table together with the figures. These scores are not, however, used by the Department to measure housing authorities' needs but are a variation on the statistical index of multiple urban deprivation used for inner city purposes in which housing variables have been given added weight.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total value of official aid Her Majesty's Government plan to allocate to supporting small-scale rural agricultural projects in Africa in 1986-87 and 1987-88, respectively.

Mr. Raison: The Government will continue to support small-scale rural agricultural projects in Africa during the period in question, but figures are not available in the form required. In 1984 British bilateral aid to agriculture and related activities in sub-Saharan Africa reached about £66 million. Figures for 1985 should be available within the next few months.

Ivory Coast

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has yet taken a decision on support for the seed production project in the Ivory Coast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The proposed seed production project at Serebou is being discussed by the Ivory Coast Government and the Commonwealth Development Corporation. Subject to a satisfactory outcome ODA bilateral country programme funds, as well as a CDC loan, would be available to help finance the project. I expect to be able to take a decision on this later this year. Meanwhile up to £350,000 of ODA funds have been allocated to refurbish the irrigation system at Serebou and to set up a mechanical workshop which should enhance the productive capacity of the existing farm.

ENERGY

Enter and Search Powers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many officials for whom he has responsibility currently have the power to enter and search premises, subject to statutory conditions; and, in each case, if he will indicate the statutory authority under which power is exercised.

Mr. Peter Walker: Thirty two officials of my Department currently have powers to enter premises for purposes which, in some circumstances, might be regarded as searching them. The purposes are to ensure the integrity and safety of mainly oil and gas installations and equipment and that discharges from them are environmentally acceptable. These powers derive principally from one or more of the following Acts and relevant Regulations made under them:

Pipe-lines Act 1962
Mineral Workings (Offshore Installations) Act 1971
Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974
Petroleum and Submarine Pipe-lines Act 1975

The 667 members of the Atomic Energy Authority constabulary have power to enter and search premises within 15 miles of any of the authority's establishments and of any other specified body corporate as defined in Schedule 1 to the Nuclear Installations Act 1965. The power is exercisable outside the premises of the bodies concerned only in respect of their property and, in the absence of an occupier's consent, only when a search warrant is issued by a magistrate. The relevant statutory authority is contained in the Atomic Energy Authority Acts 1954 ans 1971 and the Atomic Energy Authority (Special Constables) Act 1976, in conjunction with other Acts defining police powers.

Alternative Energy Sources

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment has been made by his Department of the environmental effects of alternative energy sources, such as wind power and the proposed Severn barrage.

Mr. David Hunt: The possible environmental impact of land based wind turbine generators is likely to be their visual intrusiveness, TV interference and noise. These were reviewed in Report 30 by the Energy Technology Support Unit "Prospects for the Exploitation of the renewable energy technologies in the United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the library. We are currently considering the Severn tidal power groups report and environmental factors will be one of the factors to be taken into account.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Wiltshire Police

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the authorised establishment of the Wiltshire constabulary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is the responsibility of the Wiltshire police authority to determine the authorised establishment of the force, although it must apply for my right hon. Friend's approval for any increases it deems necessary. In response to the police authority's most recent applications, my right hon. Friend approved a permanent increase of four posts in January and a temporary, supernumerary, increase of 7 posts, for 12 months in the first instance, in February. I understand the authority is considering making a further application.

M11 (Speeding Offences)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions for speeding of drivers of heavy goods vehicles there have been on the M11 in each of the last three years.

Mr. Hurd: No reliable information is available for specific types of vehicles or for motorways, separately or in aggregate. The available information on findings of guilt for speed limit offences, including that by police force area, is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, Supplementary Tables" (Tables 5 and 18 of the Issue for 1984), copies of which are in the Library.

News International Plant, Wapping

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many instances the Metropolitan police have used video film or photographs of demostrators taken at the News International plant in Wapping in an attempt to identify demonstrators who they believe may be guilty of a criminal offence in connection with the picketing or demonstration; and what criteria are used, in deciding whether to bring charges on the basis of such photographic evidence, as to its possible use in subsequence court proceedings.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner informs me that there have been no such instances. The use of photographs in court proceedings depends on the circumstances of the case.

Metropolitan Police (Photographic Enhancement Service)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of images processed by the Metropolitan police scientific research and development branch's photographic enhancement service for the year 1985-86; if he will give a breakdown on the basis of picture source, type of subject and type of crime; if he will indicate whether these figures include video film; and if he will state whether the scientific research and development branch enhances video pictures.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Metropolitan police video tape laboratory, which enhances video tapes only, processed 629 video tapes in the year eneded 31st March 1986. The great majority of these related to offences of theft or criminal damage. 520 were supplied by private bodies and 109 by the police. Computer enhancement was used in 60 cases; four police tapes were enhanced for training purposes and 56 tapes were enhanced to identify suspects for the following offences:

Offence	Police tapes	Private tapes
Theft and fraud	4	46
Criminal damage	—	2
Murder	1	—
Assault	—	1
Public order	1	—
Drugs	1	—

In addition, the Home Office Scientific Research and Development Branch examined three cases for the Metropolitan police in the year in question. In two cases still photographs were enhanced; one of people suspected of offences of violence, the other of a vehicle in relation to suspected theft. One video film belonging to a private firm was enhanced to attempt to identify people in connection with a murder inquiry.

Residential Care Television Licence

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will bring forward proposals to remove the anomalies in the 5p accommodation for residential care television licence eligibility conditions identified by the Annan committee;

(2) if he has any plans to phase out the 5p television licence scheme for certain residential care establishments.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Some of the anomalies in the accommodation for residential care licence identified by the Annan committee were dealt with in the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) Regulations 1984, (SI 1984 No. 1053), which extended the concession to physically disabled and mentally disordered people living in eligible accommodation, and to certain accommodation provided by housing associations and old persons' accommodation financed and run by charitable bodies. We have no immediate proposals for further changes to the scheme; but it is clearly bound up with the larger question of the arrangements for financing the BBC through the television licence fee which have been examined by the Peacock committee, whose report we have now received.

Representation of the People Act 1985

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy in making regulations under the Representation of the People Act 1985 that there be provision for the delivery of one unaddressed electoral communication to each separately identifiable individual residential unit.

Mr. Mellor: This matter will be dealt with in regulations to be made by the Post Office later this year under section 91 of the 1985 Act. It is intended to provide in the Regulations for the delivery of one unaddressed election communication to each point that normally receives a separate delivery of mail.

Violent Crime (Statistics)

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the latest available statistics for the success rate in solving crimes of violence, distinguishing between murder, assault and rape; and what were the comparable figures for 1979-80.

Mr. Hurd: Clear-up rates for different types of offences are published each year in chapter 2 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (Cmnd. 9621 for 1984) and most recently for 1985 in table 5 of "Home Office Statistical Bulletin", Issue No. 4/86.

Neighbourhood Watch

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest progress achieved in promoting neighbourhood watch schemes; and what steps he is taking to encourage the growth of such schemes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of neighbourhood watch schemes continues to increase and there are now some 10,000 schemes in existence in England and Wales. There are encouraging indications that, where schemes are carefully designed and introduced, crime is reduced. Steps are being taken to monitor the progress of a number of schemes and the results of this work will provide useful lessons for the future.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes are now operative in England and Wales.

Mr. Giles Shaw: About 10,000.

Civil Defence

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of civil defence volunteers who have received training in understanding the hazards of radiation; and what are the measures that they can advise being taken by people to avoid contamination.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The effects of, and protection against nuclear attack are included in the training programme for all civil defence volunteers. Records are not kept centrally of the numbers who have been trained.

The review of emergency arrangements for peacetime disasters following Chernobyl will include the potential role for civil defence.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions: (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Hurd: The information is as follows:

	Session 1983-84	Session 1984-85
(a) Officials	18 (21)	19 (26)
(b) Ministers	2 (4)	4 (4)

The figures in brackets give the total numbers of appearances made by officials and Ministers respectively.

Drug Offences

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give a breakdown of the number of people arrested for drug related offences in the London borough of Newham for each of the past five years, by age and sex;

(2) if he will list the number of people arrested for drug related offences in the London borough of Newham, by type of drug, for each of the last five years;

(3) if he will state the total number of people arrested for drug-related offences in the London borough of Newham in each of the past five years, with the number of convictions obtained.

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals in the past five years, charged with supplying heroin, were bailed on their first appearance in court.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown by opiate and non-opiate drug dependency of the number of addicts in the London borough of Newham for each of the last five years.

Mr. Hurd: The information requested is not available centrally.

PRIME MINISTER

British Pensioners (Canada)

Q11. Mr. Nelson asked the Prime Minister what representation she has received regarding the position of British pensioners living in Canada.

The Prime Minister: In 1983, during my visit to Canada, Prime Minister Trudeau raised with me the question of the indexation of United Kingdom pensions payable in Canada. On that visit I also received a petition from the British Pensioners' Association of Canada. I regularly receive letters from British pensioners in Canada on the matter.

Lance-Corporal Simon Cockton

Q28. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will explain the reasons why Her Majesty's Government have taken over three years to establish that the helicopter carrying Lance-Corporal Simon Cockton was shot down by a missile fired from HMS Cardiff on 6 June 1982; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to him by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 12 June at column 290-1.

Legal Aid Funding

Q54. Mr. Shersby asked the Prime Minister if she will now make a statement on the review of legal aid funding.

The Prime Minister: The report of the review team has now been completed. Arrangements are being made for it to be published as soon as possible. There will then be a period of consultation before decisions are taken on its recommendations.

Hurn (Visit)

Mr. Adley asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Hurn, Christchurch, Dorset.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister if she will take action to reduce the number of parking fines incurred by her Ministers whilst attending official lunch-time engagements.

The Prime Minister: The rules for the use of official cars by Ministers are well established and no amendment is needed.

Engagements

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with His Majesty King Hussein.

Mr. Rooker asked the Prime Minister if she will list the Ministers who have received deputations from Birmingham city council in the current year, stating the dates and the purpose of each meeting.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 16 June 1986]: The information is as follows:

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities (Funding)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria were used by the University Grants Committee to decide the allocation of research funds to universities.

Mr. Walden: The allocation of recurrent grant to the universities recently announced by the University Grants Committee took account in its provision for research of the number of staff and research students in universities, universities' income from research councils, charitable bodies, contract research income from industry and Government Departments and the committee's own rating of the quality of research in the different subject areas in each university, in the light of universities' own research statements and the advice of the research councils and other bodies.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria were used by the University Grants Committee to decide the allocation of funds for university buildings.

Mr. Walden: The recently announced recurrent grant allocations include resources to enable universities to undertake minor capital works, which were allocated pro rata to student numbers. Further resources may be allocated for specific minor capital works in the course of the academic year. Funds for major capital works are allocated from the capital subhead of the universities Vote in respect of specific projects approved by the University Grants Committee; these were not covered by the grant allocation letter of 20 May.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what efforts were made by the University Grants Committee to advise universities in advance of the criteria that would be used for the allocation of funds.

Mr. Walden: The University Grants Committee wrote to universities on 19 November 1984 to outline its intention to review grant distribution; on 9 May 1985 to set out a new framework for the allocation of grant and to seek responses from universities; and on 19 November 1985 to describe the new grant allocation procedure in detail. An article by the chairman of the University Grants Committee in The Times Higher Education Supplement of 15 November provided further explanation. The committee's grant allocation letter of 20 May 1986 and its annexes gave universities an account of their individual grant allocations.

Hemel Hempstead School (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Robert B. James asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the Parliamentary Under-Secretary's recent visit to Hemel Hempstead school.

Mr. Dunn: I was pleased to be able to visit Hemel Hempstead school on 3 March this year. I was encouraged particularly by the evident enthusiasm and commitment of the head master, staff and pupils and the very active involvement of the school governors and parents.

Secondary Schools

Mr. Robert B. James asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many surplus school places at secondary level there are in Hertfordshire; and what percentage that represents of total secondary school places.

Mr. Dunn: The total number of surplus school places in Hertfordshire at maintained secondary schools, excluding middle schools, was 6,401 at 1 September 1985; this represents 8·2 per cent. of all permanent places at maintained secondary schools in the county.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

Certificate of Pre-vocational Education

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what budget exists, how much has been spent and in what ways to make potential employers aware of the certificate of pre-vocational education; and what response to the qualification has been received from employers.

Mr. Chris Patten: The publicity costs of the certificate of pre-vocational education are met by the Department of Education and Science and the Joint Board for Pre-Vocational Education. In 1985-86 some £140,000 of separately identifiable expenditure was used to produce leaflets for schools, pupils and employers as well as some national advertising. It is anticipated that some £250,000 will be provided by the Department in 1986-87 as grant-in-aid to the joint board for publicity. It is too soon to say how the CPVE has been received by industry, although early responses are encouraging.

Higher Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what percentage of those English students who go on to higher education go to universities.

(2) what percentage of those English students who go on to higher and further education go to universities.

Mr. Walden: In 1984, 47 per cent. of full-time and sandwich higher education students in England were studying at universities in England; 26 per cent. of all those in further and higher education were studying at universities in England.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will publish a table showing the percentage of Welsh students in universities in the United Kingdom who go to universities in (a) Wales, (b) in Northern Ireland, (c) in Scotland and (d) in England;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the percentage of Scottish students in universities in the United Kingdom who go to universities (a) in Scotland, (b) in England, (c) in Wales, and (d) in Northern Ireland;

(3) if he will publish a table showing the percentage of English students at universities in the United Kingdom who go to universities (a) in England, (b) in Wales, (c) in Northern Ireland and (d) in Scotland.

Mr. Walden: The required figures for 1984-85 are shown in the following tables:

Full-time and sandwich home university students by country of domicile and study 1984-85

*Home Students domiciled in	Number
a. Wales	12,644

c. England	11,061 5·3 per cent.	8,093 3·9 per cent.	186,663 90·5 per cent.	557 0·3 per cent.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what (a) number and (b) percentage of people aged between 16 and 21 years in (i) Scotland, (ii) England, (iii) Wales and (iv) Northern Ireland are in higher education in the United Kingdom for each year from 1979 to date;

(2) what (a) percentage and (b) numbers of young people in (i) Scotland, (ii) England, (iii) Wales and (iv) Northern Ireland went on to higher and further education for each year from 1979 to date.

Mr. Walden: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Teachers

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue guidance as to the weight to be given to the sexual orientation of those applying for teaching posts in county, voluntary aided and controlled schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: As my hon. Friend knows, it is for the employers (local education authorities and, in the case of voluntary aided schools, governors) to recruit teachers, taking due account of candidates' qualifications, experience and suitability for the post. In so doing they will take account of the requirements of relevant legislation, including the Sex Discrimination Act, the Race Relations Act and the Education (Teachers) Regulations 1982, which provide for the Secretary of State to bar persons from employment as teachers on grounds of health or misconduct or on educational grounds.

Students

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what percentage of those Welsh students who go on to higher education go to universities;

(2) what percentage of those Welsh students who go on to higher and further education go to universities.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have been asked to reply.

In 1984, 47·5 per cent. of Welsh full-time and sandwich higher education students were in universities. The comparable proportion in respect of further and higher education students was 27·2 per cent.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Inter-governmental Conference (Maryfield Secretariat)

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much the Government of the Irish Republic have contributed financially towards the administration and general expenses of the Maryfield secretariat of the Anglo-Eire inter-governmental conference.

Mr. Scott: The administrative costs of Maryfield, including such items as rent, rates, heating and lighting, furniture, office equipment and telephones, are shared by the two Governments. Up to 12 June 1986, the Republic of Ireland Government had contributed £26,158 towards these costs.

Asbestos

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if Her Majesty's Government has any plans to finance safe asbestos removal programmes in the Province;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce legislation further to control asbestos pollution in the Province; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what representations he has received asking him to introduce legislation to control asbestos pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The Government have no plans to finance an asbestos removal programme. It is proposed to introduce subordinate legislation for Northern Ireland later this year to bring atmospheric pollution from specified industrial processes involving asbestos under the control of the alkali and radiochemical inspectorate. It is also planned to introduce new regulations, supported by an approved code of practice, for the control of asbestos at work. These will implement the EC directives on asbestos and will provide further protection for employees and others from health risks arising from work with asbestos. No representations regarding legislation on asbestos have been received.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have died from asbestos-related diseases in the Province in each of the past five years.

Mr. Needham: The information is as follows:

Higher Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what percentage of those Northern Irish students who go on to higher education go to university;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the percentage of Northern Irish students at universities in the United Kingdom who go to universities in (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Scotland, (c) England and (d) Wales.

Dr. Mawhinney: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS Central Register

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name, list and describe what records are kept of disclosures of information from the National Health Services central register; and if he will publish a summary of the relevant statistics for 1985.

Mr. Major: The National Health Service central register is an integral part of the patient registration system administered by family practitioner committees. Patient information held there is limited to name, date of birth, NHS number and an indication of which FPC currently holds the patient's registration with a NHS doctor.

Disclosure of information from NHS central register records is almost entirely confined to FPCs and the NHS units for whom NHSCR acts as a clearing house for greater efficiency in the adminstration of Family Practitioner Services.

Information relating to mortality and cancer registrations obtained via OPCS is also used to help researchers in approved medical research and statistical studies, and, also clinicians following up their own patients. Indirect assistance in communicating with patients is provided, with the approval and co-operation of FPC administrators, in circumstances which are clearly to the advantage of the patient or in cases of family separation, illness or bereavement. Assistance is provided to courts seeking to issue or enforce maintenance orders, or orders in respect of wards of court; to police in cases of serious crime and to DHSS to identify the owners of medical cards used in suspected fraudulent encashment of social security cheques.

Apart from the disclosure of information to bodies within the National Health Service and to research studies, requests for information from other sources amount to approximately 1,200 per year.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether instructions have been issued to staff of his Department on the subject of obtaining disclosure of information from the National Health Service central register in the course of investigating actual or suspected fraud by social security claimants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: It is not in the public interest to disclose operational procedures for the investigation of social security fraud.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the instructions under which information from the National Health Service central register may be disclosed for any purpose of law enforcement, including disclosure to staff of his Department investigating actual or suspected fraud by social security claimants.

Mr. Major: The Code of Guidance used by the National Health Service central register states—

"there may sometimes be exceptional circumstances which justify the disclosure of information to a law enforcement agency if it can help prevent or detect the commission of a serious crime or bring the criminal to justice . . .

Serious crime may be deemed to include murder, manslaughter, rape, kidnapping, acts of terrorism, causing explosions likely to end life or cause damage to property, possession of firearms with intent to injure, hostage taking, hi-jacking, serious harm to the security of the State or to public order, serious interference with the administration of justice. The onus should be on the enquirer to satisfy NHSCR that the crime is sufficiently serious and that the task of preventing or detecting it would be seriously prejudiced if disclosure were not to be made." (In all requests to trace patients the Administrator of the appropriate Family Practitioner Committee would be fully involved.)

"Arrangements have been agreed to help DHSS fraud officers where a medical card has been used as a means of identification when cashing a social security giro cheque which subsequently is found to be fraudulent. NHSCR assistance is provided in response only to a written request from a regional controller and is usually limited to providing the identity of the person recorded against the stated NHS number".

Benefits (Fraud)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will describe the circumstances in which information from the National Health Service central register may be made available to regional office staff or to local office staff in the course of investigating actual or suspected fraud by social security claimants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: On request from a DHSS regional controller, National Health Service central register will supply the name and date of birth appropriate to a NHS number shown on a medical card that has been used as a means of identification when cashing a social security giro cheque which susequently has been found to be fraudulent.

NHSCR assistance is provided on the grounds that a person who voluntarily produces a medical card as evidence of identity should be willing to accept a check on that identity by the authorities concerned; and if the card used does not relate to the person who produced it the proper holder has apparently lost it and the current holder has no title to it.

Health Records (Law Enforcement)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will describe the circumstances in which information may be disclosed from medical records and from National Health Service records for any purpose of law enforcement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Safeguarding the confidentiality of medical and other National Health Service records is primarily an ethical matter for the health professionals concerned. The disclosure of identifiable personal information from such records for a purpose other than that for which it was obtained would usually require the agreement of the doctors concerned, who would decide whether the consent of the patient should also be sought.

Professional guidance recognises that there may be cases, for example those involving serious crime, when the public interest outweighs the patient's right to confidentiality. The decision to disclose information would usually be for the doctor to make in the light of the circumstances of a particular case.

The department is currently preparing a Code on Confidentiality of Personal Health Information in the National Health Service which it is intended will be given statutory force and which will set out the limited circumstances in which personal health information may be disclosed without the patient's consent.

Health Authorities (Computer Records)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps are being taken to put health authority computer records on a national basis; and what procedure is being adopted to enable health authorities to know the availability of beds in each category in other areas.

Mr. Whitney: Work is being undertaken centrally on a number of technical initiatives aimed at producing standards for communication between various types of computer systems in use in the National Health Service, in accordance with the Government's commitment to the adoption of Open Systems Interconnection (OSI). Nevertheless, the introduction of computerised record systems remains a matter for each health authority to determine in accordance with its own priorities.

Health authorities locally have access to a range of statistical information about other authorities, including bed availability and waiting lists held by regional health authorities and by the Department.

Cross-boundary Charging

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to implement cross-boundary charging in England.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have no plans to do so. I welcome the experiments begun by a few health authorities in cross-boundary charging for certain specialist services. However costings systems are not yet sufficiently developed to support national arrangements; administrative costs could be heavy; and formal charging arrangements between health authorities for all their services might not be fully compatible with general practitioners' freedom to refer patients to the hospital consultant of their choice.

Existing resource allocation arrangements take account of patient flows across health authority boundaries in determining target allocations. This is one of the issues being examined in the review of the RAWP formula.

British Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has of the additional annual cost of paying British retirement and widowed pensioners aged 75 years and over living (a) in Canada and (b) in South Africa, the rate of pension they would receive if living in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Major: On the basis of a full year at today's pension levels, the additional cost of paying British retirement and widows' pensions at rates current in the United Kingdom to pensioners aged 75 years and over living (a) in Canada and (b) in South Africa would be approximately £9·9 million and £3 million respectively.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospitals have been closed each year since 1979; and how many wards in remaining hospitals have been (a) partially and (b) wholly closed each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 3 March at column 62.

Ancillary Services (In-house Contracts)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities have awarded contracts for cleaning, catering and laundry in-house notwithstanding a lower tender having been available from an outside contractor; and if he will give details of the difference in price in each case.

Mr Whitney: Health authorities are required to accept the lowest tender unless there are compelling reasons not to do so. We are aware of the following cases to us this year where an in-house tender was accepted when it was not the lowest tender:

Health Authority	Type of Contract	Hospital
Gloucester	Domestic	Gloucester Royal Infirmary
North West Hertfordshire	Domestic	Hemel Hempstead General Hospital
South Tyneside	Domestic	Community Clinics
West Suffolk	Domestic	West Suffolk and Thetford Hospitals

The prices involved are regarded as confidential.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average amount paid to each claimant in severe weather payments in the United Kingdom, in England and in East Sussex, respectively; and what has been the average time delay in making such payments.

Mr. Major: The information is not available. When the period during which payments are likely to be made is over, local offices will be asked to make a return so that the average amount paid can be calculated.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for severe weather payments were made in his Department's offices in Brighton, Leicester and Walthamstow in 1985 and 1986; how many of the claims in each year were successful; and what was the average sum paid out.

Mr. Major: Separate information on the number of claims for exceptionally severe weather payments is not collected. The total number of payments made in 1985 by these offices was as follows:

Local office	Number of payments	Average amount £
Brighton	374	9·77
Leicester:
Burleys Way	501	9·08
Lower Hill Street	323	7·38
Norton Street	740	14·00
Yeoman Street	676	13·85
Walthamstow	522	9·92

Information for 1986 is not available. When the period during which payments are likely to be made is over, local offices will be asked to make a return so that the number of payments and the average amount can be calculated.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people were employed by his Department in the east midlands in 1979 and at the latest available date;

(2) how many people were employed in clerical positions by his Department in the east midlands in 1979 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Major: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to those offices which were in the Department's east midlands and east Anglia region and were transferred to the midland region on reorganisation in August 1982.

Information is not available in the precise form requested. The complement allocated to east midlands offices for April 1979 and the intended 1 July 1986 staff allocation are set out in the table. They reflect overall reductions in work load over the period mainly due to the introduction of housing benefit and statutory sick pay.

	Total staff	Number of clerical staff
1979	3,747	2,559
1986	3,814	2,319·5

Heart Patients (Deaths)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many deaths have occurred, both in total numbers as a percentage, of patients on waiting lists for coronary artery by-pass operations for every year for the past 15 years.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. It is not collected centrally.

Ambulance Service (Bromley)

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the new recruits currently being trained at the London ambulance service headquarters training school will be allocated to the Bromley health authority area.

Mr. Whitney: Of the 32 recruits who started training on 9 June and who will be operational on 7 July, four are to be posted to Bromley. A further course is due to begin on 23 June and a trainee from that will also go to Bromley.

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he anticipates that the London ambulance service will be in a position to restore the reductions recently made in non-emergency provision within the area of the Bromley health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that it is not possible to give a precise date but recruitment will continue and the South West Thames regional health authority is monitoring the position with the other Thames regions.

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Bromley health authority was first informed of the offer by the London ambulance service to loan ambulances to health authorities, together with the cash for any drivers recruited locally; and how many such ambulances have been loaned in this way to the Bromley health authority.

Mr. Whitney: The facility to loan ambulances to health authorities has been available for many years. Bromley district health authority, however, did not use this until 1 May 1986 when it took one vehicle for use at the Phoenix centre. I understand it is currently considering whether to take further vehicles on loan.

Baby Care Units (North-Western Region)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the provision of special baby care units in the north-western region; and what representations he has received about problems faced by the unit at Hope Hospital in Salford; what assessment he has made of the extent to which the service provided by that unit meets the priority criteria laid down by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: In 1984, the latest year for which information is available centrally, there were 20 National Health Service hospitals in the North Western regional health authority with a special baby care unit. Two representations have been received about the unit at Hope hospital. These are being looked into by Salford health authority which is responsible for the provision of maternity services in Salford, in line with advice given by the Maternity Services Advisory Committee. The hon. Member may therefore wish to address any concerns to the chairman of that authority.

Capital Projects

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will identify those capital projects approved in (a) Frenchay, (b) Bristol and Weston and (c) Southmead health authorities since 1979, with an expenditure in excess of £75,000.

Mr. Whitney: Regional health authorities have delegated responsibility for approving capital projects whose works cost does not exceed £5 million. As much of the information requested is not available centrally, my hon. Friend may wish to contact the chairman of the South Western regional health authority for a comprehensive list of approvalsin these district authorities and, before 1982, the Avon area health authority.

We do have information about three schemes approved for construction during the period as follows:

District	Scheme	Works cost £ million	Status
Bristol and Weston	Bristol Eye Hospital	4·02	Completed in 1985
Frenchay	Frenchay DGH Phase 1	6·72	Building about to start
Southmead	Southmead Central Delivery Suite	1·11	Completed in 1985

Angioplasty

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of an angioplasty to the National Health Service; and what is the amount charged to a private patient for this operation when performed in a National Health Service hospital.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that information on the cost of an angioplasty is not available. At present charges to private in-patients are based on average costs for treating all conditions, and are dependent therefore on the length of stay of each patient and the class of hospital in which they are treated. This will obviously vary according to circumstances.

Motor Neurone Disease

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the number of people who have died of the motor neurone disease in each of the last five years.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of deaths with an underlying cause of death stated as motor neurone disease registered in England and Wales in each of the last five years are shown in the table.

Number of deaths from motor neurone disease, persons, all ages England and Wales: 1981 to 1985

Cause of death	ICD code	1981	1982	1983	*1984	*1985
Motor neurone disease	335.2	883	824	942	1,005	1,103

* Because of a change in coding rules, figures for 1984 and 1985 are not strictly comparable with those of earlier years. Figures for 1985 are provisional.

Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the number of people currently suffering from the motor neurone disease.

Mr. Whitney: There are no centrally collected statistics about the total number of people currently suffering from motor neurone disease. In 1984, the latest year for which information is available centrally, there were an estimated 2,170 discharges (including deaths in hospital) of in-patients from National Health Service non-psychiatric hospitals in England with a main diagnosis of motor neurone disease.

It has been estimated that in the United Kingdom some 5,000 people suffer from this disease and that about 1,000 new cases are diagnosed each year.

SCOTLAND

Student Allowances

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the levels of students' allowances for Scottish students in the academic year 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: The main rates of allowances for students on degree and equivalent courses will be increased by 2 per cent. and by a further £36 for students who live away from the parental home. They will be:

(a) for students living in the parental home	1,390
(b) for students living away from home and attending an establishment outside London	1,846
(c) for students living away from home and attending an establishment in London	2,191

The parental contribution scale will be adjusted upwards in line with earnings.

Allowances for mature students will be increased by 2 per cent. plus £40 per annum.

Allowances for special equipment for students attending certain courses will be discontinued.

Students in receipt of grants will continue to be eligible for reimbursement of travelling expenses in excess of £50 already included in the main rates.

Certain other changes will be announced in a supplement to the Scottish Education Department's "Guide to Students' Allowances, 1986-87".

The arrangements for the financial support of Scottish-domiciled students will, in addition, be included in the wide ranging review of students' awards which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced today. The Scottish Education Department will be fully involved in that review and the particular circumstances relating to students in higher education in Scotland will be fully taken into account.

Mentally Handicapped Persons

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the progress towards meeting the SHAPE priorities laid down in 1980 with regard to the support of mentally handicapped patients in the community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The report on the SHAPE priorities (Scottish Health Authorities Priorities for the Eighties) was addressed primarily to the authorities responsible for the health services in Scotland, whereas the responsibility for providing facilities for the support of the mentally handicapped in the community rests mainly with local authorities. So far as increasing the provision in the community for this group is concerned, there has been substantial progress in the period from March 1979 to March 1985 and various supported accommodation and day care facilities have been established, including 350 units of special needs housing provided by housing associations, an increase of 377 places in staffed homes provided by local authorities and voluntary bodies and the provision of some 300 places in unregistered homes provided by voluntary bodies. Day centre provision for the mentally handicapped has increased by some 2,190 places in the same period. It is for local authorities to determine whether still greater priority should be given to further developments in their own areas in relation to the services for which they are responsible.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many in-patients there are in Lennox castle hospital, the Royal Scottish national hospital and in other National Health Service hospitals in Scotland as a consequence of mental handicap at the latest convenient date; and what were the comparable figures five and 10 years ago.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is as follows:

In-patients with mental handicap resident at 31 December each year in:

	1977	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
(a) Lennox castle hospital	1,393	1,341	1,314	1,259	1,205	1,115	1,094
(b) The Royal Scottish national hospital	1,239	1,140	1,119	1,084	1,063	1,030	974
(c) Other mental handicap hospitals	7,018	6,670	6,518	6,474	6,153	5,963	*
(d) Mental illness hospitals and psychiatric units	1,020	869	853	821	855	825	*

* Figures not yet available.

In the period since 1985 the number of in-patients has been reduced to around 1,000 at Lennox castle and 900 at the Royal Scottish national hospital.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many places there are in group homes and hostels for those suffering from mental illness and mental handicap, respectively, in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: Provision for this client group by local authorities and voluntary bodies is mainly in the form of staffed accommodation, but it is estimated that in 1985 there were 112 places for the mentally ill and 17 for the mentally handicapped in local authority or registered group homes. There were in addition some 370 places for the mentally ill and 310 for the mentally handicapped in group homes and other premises known to local authorities where the amount of social work involvement was not considered sufficient to require registration.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent studies have been done at Lennox castle hospital and the Royal Scottish national hospital to establish if there are any in-patients who on the Wessex scale of competence would be able to respond to training programmes designed to allow their discharge to a group home or hostel; and if he will make a statement on the results.

Mr. Rifkind: Surveys of all in-patients using the Wessex scale of competence were carried out in Lennox castle hospital in December 1984 and in the Royal Scottish national hospital in February 1984. These showed that 10 per cent. of the patients in Lennox castle hospital and 36 per cent. of the patients at the Royal Scottish national hospital had the basic skills to enable them to live independently. I have indicated in a separate reply to the hon. Member that progress has been made in providing facilities in the community to enable mentally handicapped persons who are capable of doing so to live independently.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been spent in each health board area by the boards and local authority on jointly planned and financed projects to create community facilities to support mentally ill and mentally handicapped patients in each of the last five years.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is not available centrally.

Royal Scottish National Hospital

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps were taken by his Department to act on the letter from the chairman of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland dated 10 September 1985 addressed to the then Secretary of State for Scotland which expressed grave concern about conditions at the Royal Scottish national hospital.

Mr. Rifkind: Following the receipt of the letter referred to by the hon. Member, senior officials of the Scottish Home and Health Department visited the Royal Scottish national hospital on 8 November 1985 and had a lengthy meeting at the hospital with the chairman of Forth Valley health board and his advisers to discuss what could be done quickly to bring about improvements to the buildings and to raise the staffing levels at the hospital. In recognition of the health board's swift response to their earlier criticism, the chairman of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland wrote to the chairman of Forth Valley health board earlier this year following a regular annual visit to the Royal Scottish national hospital to say that the commission had been enormously impressed at the improvements which had taken place in the hospital since its last visit in February 1985, and much encouraged that problems of leadership and inter-professional co-operation had within a very short period of time largely disappeared. The commission noted that the response of the health board had been immediate and most beneficial to the welfare of the patients.

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has had any representations from the Royal College of Psychiatrists about conditions in the Royal Scottish national hospital and the decision to withdraw training rights from that hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have had no such representations from the Royal College of Psychiatrists. I understand that the decision by the college to withdraw training recognition was based on the limited opportunity available to registrars to practise in-patient, out-patient and community psychiatric care because of the amount of time they were spending on general medical care of the patients in the hospital. The health board is taking steps to remedy the position.

Mental Welfare Commission

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department has given any guidance to the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland as to the policy of making unannounced visits to hospitals; and whether that policy is still being followed.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, though the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland is an independent body and it must answer for how it carries out its statutory duties. I understand that the commission and health boards have agreed arrangements about notifying the commission's intention to undertake visits to hospitals. It makes unannounced visits when this is felt to be justified.

Hospitals (Reports)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to publish the reports issued from time to time on hospitals by the Scottish Hospital Advisory Service and the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The individual reports prepared by these two bodies on their respective visits to hospitals are primarily for the benefit of the hospitals themselves and the health boards in whose areas they are situated, and I have no plans to arrange for their publication. However, general reports on the work of both bodies are now published annually. A report by the director of the Scottish Hospital Advisory Service is included in the annual report by the Chief Medical Officer of the Scottish Home and Health Department; and since last year the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland has been required to present an annual report to Parliament. Copies of both reports are available in the Library.

Mental Hospitals (Patient-Staff Ratios)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the patient-staff ratios for Lennox castle, the Royal Scottish national hospital and for hospitals dealing with the problems of the mentally handicapped in Scotland as a whole at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Rifkind: At 31 March 1985, the ratio of average whole-time equivalent staff numbers per 100 patients in these hospitals was as follows:

	Numbers
Lennox castle hospital	78·2
The Royal Scottish national hospital	90·2
All Scottish mental handicap hospitals	93·5

Note:
These ratios are expressed in terms of staff numbers per 100 "weighted" patients to reflect the fact that, in addition to in-patients, hospitals also treat out-patients and day patients.

Mental Illness Hospitals (Violent Incidents)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the number of violent incidents in mental illness hospitals in Scotland in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement on the trend revealed by these figures.

Mr. John MacKay: Althought a record is kept by the hospital authorities of all incidents involving violence of any degree to patients or staff, this information is not collated centrally. Apart from any other investigations carried out locally into such incidents, the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland has a duty to inquire into any case where it appears to it that there has been any ill treatment of a person who may be suffering from a mental disorder.

Asbestos

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he has any plans to introduce further legislation to control asbestos pollution in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received asking him to introduce legislation to control asbestos pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Eight representations on the need for further controls over asbestos in the environment have been received over the last two years.

The emission of asbestos is controlled under the Health and Safety (Emissions into the Atmosphere) Regulations 1983. The handling and disposal of asbestos waste is controlled under the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980 and the Control of Pollution (Licensing of Waste Disposal) (Scotland) Regulations 1977, which are under review.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to finance safe asbestos removal programmes in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: No. The Government are opposed to wholesale asbestos replacement programmes since it is often preferable to leave asbestos materials undisturbed because they are already, or can easily be, securely protected.

Where asbestos treatment or removal is justified, expenditure for this purpose is a matter for local authorities and health boards which are best placed to identify any problems and to determine their own spending priorities. Nevertheless, my right hon. and learned Friend pays particular attention to any special needs brought to his attention in determining the resources to be made available to these authorities.

Hospital Patients (Transfers)

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients are at present in the state hospital, Carstairs, whose transfer to an ordinary National Health Service hospital has been approved; and if he will give the names of the hospitals to which transfers have been approved and the number of patients concerned for each such hospital.

Mr. Rifkind: There are at present 15 patients in the State hospital whose transfer to an ordinary mental hospital has been approved. These patients are awaiting transfer to the following hospitals:

Hospital	Number of patients
Ailsa hospital, Ayr	2
Ayrshire central hospital, Irvine	1
Dykebar hospital, Paisley	3
Gartnavel Royal hospital, Glasgow	2
Gogarburn hospital, Edinburgh	3
Kirklands hospital, Bothwell	1
Lynebank hospital, Dunfermline	1
Merchiston hospital, Johnstone	1
Ravenscraig hospital, Greenock	1

Note: One of the 15 is a State patient.

Criminal Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of crimes recorded by the police in Scotland during the second six months of 1985, the number of crimes recorded in each category and the clear-up rates in total and by category.

Mr. Rifkind: The number of crimes recorded, by category, during the second half of 1985 is as set out. Information on clear-up rates is not available for periods of less than a year, as it is collected in an annual return for the year as a whole. Clear-up figures for 1985 will be published shortly.

Crimes Recorded, by Category: Scotland July to December 1985

	Number
Non-sexual Crimes of Violence	7,969
Crimes of Indecency	2,781
Crimes of Dishonesty	174,754
Fire-raising, Vandalism etc.	40,243
Other Crimes	10,303
Total Crimes	236,050

Dornoch Firth (Road Bridge)

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his proposals for a road bridge over the Dornoch firth.

Mr. Rifkind: It is my intention to proceed with plans to construct a road bridge over the Dornoch firth. Subject to the availability of finance and the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures, construction of the approach roads is planned to begin in financial year 1987-88, with construction of the bridge structure to follow in 1988-89. My Department will be holding a design-and-build competition for the bridge, the first stage of which will be to issue an invitation at the beginning of July to selected competitors for the submission of design proposals.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

GCSE (Funding)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures will be taken to ensure that funds allocated specifically for the general certificate of secondary education are used exclusively for that purpose; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: So far some £90 million is being targeted in support of the introduction of the GCSE. The Government are supporting expenditure of £40 million on books and equipment, £20 million in this current year and £10 million in each of the next two years, and have also committed some £10 million towards the in-service training of GCSE teachers. Moreover, local authorities have planned for an allocation to the GCSE of some £40 million in this current year.

Of the £40 million expenditure on books and equipment for the GCSE, £35 million is to be supported by education support grant: under the education support grant regulations, local authorities have to secure from their auditors a certificate that expenditure was incurred on the activities for which approval was given. The allocation of £5 million being made available for the provision of scientific and technological equipment is a matter being considered by my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment in conjunction with the Manpower Services Commission.

As to the funds for training, local authorities are required to certify that teachers have been released to attend GCSE training courses in order to qualify for grant under the in-service teacher training grants scheme.

Teachers

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers were employed by local education authorities in England in January; and what is his estimate of the pupil-teacher ratio.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In January 1986 local education authorities in England employed the full-time equivalent of 402,900 teachers for service in nursery, primary and secondary schools. On the basis of estimated pupil numbers, the overall ratio of pupils to teachers is now at its best ever level of 17.6:1. This is a significant improvement on the 1979 ratio of 18.9:1.

Examinations (Statistics)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give the numbers of children in England and Wales who have taken A-levels in each year over the last 10 years, the number of subjects taken and the number of passes; and if he will give corresponding details for Hertfordshire;

(2) if he will give the numbers of children in Hertfordshire who have taken O-levels in each year over the last 10 years, the number of subjects and the number of passes;

(3) if he will give the numbers of children in Hertfordshire who have taken the certificate of secondary education each year over the last 10 years, the number of subjects taken and the number of passes;

(4) if he will give the numbers of children in England and Wales who have taken the certificate of secondary education each year over the last 10 years, the number of subjects taken and the number of passes;

(5) if he will list the number of children in England and Wales who, on reaching school leaving age, have not taken certificate of secondary education or O-level exams, over the last 10 years; and if he will list corresponding details for Hertfordshire;

(6) if he will list the numbers of children in England and Wales who have taken O-levels in each year over the last 10 years, the number of subjects taken and the number of passes.

Village Schools

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the continuing need for small village schools in rural areas in the light of paragraphs 272-75 of the White Paper "Better Schools", dealing with minimum size of school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The White Paper "Better Schools" offered guidance on the minimum size of schools as a basis for discussion with the partners in the education service. In subsequent discussions the question of small rural primary schools has been raised on a number of occasions. The White Paper makes it clear that in isolated communities it is often right to retain a small village school; and education support grant has been made available for pilot projects to examine educationally and cost effective ways improving the quality and range of the curriculum in such schools.

Warwickshire

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he can give details of funding made to the Warwickshire county council for educational purposes during 1984-85; and what will the amount be in 1985-86.

Mr. Chris Patten: Government specific grants to Warwickshire county council to support expenditurere on education totalled £8·6 million in 1984-85. This figure is based on outturn information supplied by the authority. Outturn information is not yet available for 1985-86, but the equivalent figure is estimated to be some £9·1 million. Both these figures include the grant paid to support the authority's expenditure on mandatory student awards, which was £7·5 million in 1984-85 and £7·7 million in 1985-86.

In addition to specific grant, Warwickshire receives rate support grant. This is paid in respect of all its services and it is not possible to identify a particular element as being for educational purposes.

Occultism

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance Her Majesty's inspectors are giving to schools and local education authorities relating to the teaching of occultism; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Her Majesty's inspectors have issued no guidance relating to the teaching of occultism. If during their visits to schools they come across teaching which they consider in some way detrimental to the children concerned, they will draw it to the attention of the headteacher and, if considered serious enough to warrant it, of the local education authority. I urge parents to do the same and, if necessary, to complain to my right hon. Friend, who will have the matter investigated.

NUT (Membership)

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the proportion of teachers who are members of the National Union of Teachers in (a) primary and nursery schools, (b) secondary schools and (c) all schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information in respect of (a) and (b) above is not available. In December 1984-January 1985 it is estimated that about 45 per cent.* of teachers in all maintained schools in England and Wales were members of the NUT.

* This figure has been derived from the following figures:
(1) The membership figure (216,138) as claimed by the NUT for the number of fully paid up part-time and full-time members statutorily entitled to salaries determined by the Burnham primary and secondary committee and paid accordingly by an LEA in England and Wales as at 31 December 1984. Such figures were sought by the Department from the teacher unions for the purpose of the review of the Burnham primary and secondary committee in 1985.
(2) The total number of part-time and full-time teachers employed in maintained schools in England and Wales in January 1985 as collected by DES — 476,325.

Students (Fees)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has of the percentage rise in the fees for students studying for PhDs on a part-time basis for the next academic year, and of the effect this will have on completion rates.

Mr. Walden: The level of fee to be charged to part-time students is a matter for individual universities.

Universities (Community Funding)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what account was taken, in arriving at the new formula for community funding through the University Grants Committee, of the additional costs borne by universities in the north-east for (a) heating and (b) travel to London.

Mr. Walden: None.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give, for each year for which statistics are available, and to the latest available date, such information that he has as to (a) the cost of the assisted places scheme, (b) the proportion of successful candidates who were already receiving their schooling in the independent section, or who had brothers and sisters receiving such education, (c) the average income of families who have used the assisted places scheme, and (d) what are the ages of transfer of the pupils who have moved from the state sector using the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986, c. 383]: The information requested at (a) and (b) is as follows:

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Expenditure on the assisted places scheme (£ million financial year)	3·022	8·691	14·995	22·152	29·569
Percentage of pupils* from other than publicly maintained schools (all intakes)	32·3	33·5	32·1	31·3	30·6

* Information about the siblings of assisted pupils is not collected.

As to (c), the average relevant income of families using the assisted places scheme was £7,338 per annum in 1985-86. On (d), the normal age of entry to the scheme will normally be at 11 or 13, but will vary from school to school. Some assisted places are also available for direct entry into the sixth form.

ENERGY

British Gas

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made towards the privatisation of British Gas; and if he is able to announce further details.

Mr. Peter Walker: Since my statement to the House about gas privatisation last May, the Gas Bill has received its Third Reading and is nearing Report stage in another place. I am now able to give the House further details of the basis on which, subject to passage of the legislation, the Government intend to sell the equity in British Gas plc in the autumn.

The new company's balance sheet will contain both debt and equity. This is in line with normal commercial practice. After careful consideration, the Government have decided that the debt element should be fixed at £2·5 billion. This will ensure a properly balanced capital structure while leaving the company full opportunity for business development and growth.

The Gas Bill provides the necessary powers for the Government to assume responsibility for the existing British Gas Corporation 3 per cent. guaranteed stock, which relates to liabilities incurred during nationalisation in 1948. This will be transferred to the national loans fund, which will then assume liability for the service and redemption of the stock. There will be no compensatory payment into the NLF to balance this liability, which will therefore be met from the Consolidated Fund as authorised by the money resolution passed by the House on 10 December 1985.

The gas levy, which is a tax on gas supply from offshore fields not subject to petroleum revenue tax, will decline over time in importance as the proportion of total supply from these fields reduces. The Government have decided that, as provided for in the Bill, the levy will continue at its present rate of 4p per therm.

The value of X in the regulatory formula relates to the onshore component in the maximum price chargeable to tariff consumers. It is important that X should be set so as to provide a continuing incentive for the company to contain onshore costs directly within its control and to ensure that consumers participate in the benefits of cost containment. After careful examination, I have decided that the appropriate value for the initial five-year period of the regulatory formula will be two. This will ensure that the element of the charge to tariff customers covering the delivery of gas is held at a level 2 per cent. below the rate of inflation, while the gas itself will be charged at prices under long-term contracts which are influenced by movements in oil prices, exchange rates and other factors. The formula will set a demanding discipline for the company to meet while leaving opportunities for a profit-oriented management to work for still better performance. The regime will be kept under scrutiny by the Director-General of OFGAS.

It is our intention that British Gas employees, past and present, should have every encouragement to take a stake in the new company and the Government will be offering suitably attractive terms. Most employees will be eligible for free shares worth around £70 plus £2 for each year of service. In addition, the Government will provide two free shares for each share purchased by an employee, up to a maximum of £300 of free shares for £150 purchased. It will also be open to employees to purchase up to £2,000 worth of shares at a discount of 10 per cent. For British Gas pensioners there will be a free offer worth around £75. Both pensioners and employees will be able to apply on a priority basis for additional shares. The free and matching offers for employees will be available to all in continuous employment from 1 May 1986 who are contracted to work at least 16 hours a week.

The British Gas offer for sale will bring within reach of everyone the chance to share in the fortunes of a major and successful enterprise. Details of the special arrangements for share purchase we shall be making available to small investors will be announced at a later stage. These will include arrangements for domestic gas customers who register their interest in advance to purchase a guaranteed allotment of a certain number of shares.

The provisions I have announced today mark a further step towards realising a historic opportunity which will be good not only for gas consumers and all who work in the industry, but for the millions of members of the public who will be able to own shares.

Nuclear Power

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet), 12 May, Official Report, column 334, if he will list all those organisations and individuals who have made representations to his Department advocating the increased use of nuclear power in the United Kingdom in the period since 1 April.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department receives widespread representations in favour of cheaper electricity from organisations and individuals ranging from large industrial users to small domestic consumers. The Government believe that safe nuclear power has an essential contribution to make in the provision of electricity economically.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the total capacity of the generating stations for England and Wales; what is the capacity in each of the 12 area boards in England and Wales; and what is the maximum recorded demand for electricity in England and Wales and for each of the 12 area boards.

Mr. Goodlad: The CEGB and the Electricity Council advise that the figures are as follows:

1. Generating Capacity (England and Wales)
The declared net capability of the Central Electricity Generating Board at 31 March 1985 was 51,127 MW sent out (MWSO). Generation capacity operated by the 12 area boards was negligible.

2. Maximum Recorded Demand (England and Wales)
The maximum demand on the CEGB was 46,219 MWSO on 17 January 1985. The recorded figures for maximum demands on each of the 12 area boards during 1984-85 were as follows:

	Demand on CEGB MW	*Demand on other sources MW

Gas Levy

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to reduce the gas levy.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I refer to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam).

Overhead Power Cables

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will consider providing funds for research in the United Kingdom into all aspects of the environmental effects of electromagnetic fields;

(2) what information he has as to research studies investigating the possibilities of adverse effects on human health arising from residence in close proximity to high voltage overhead power cables.

Mr. Goodlad: Information on research into possible effects on human health from high voltage overhead power lines has been published in the medical and electrical press and in conference reports. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received an annual report from the Central Electricity Generating Board on its own research and worldwide monitoring programme in this field. The board's programme has been subject to independent review by its epidemiology advisory committee and by my right hon. Friend's Advisory Council on Research and Development. I am advised that the research has given no reason to suppose that electric or magnetic fields or air-ions as normally encountered by people living or working near power transmission plant in the United Kingdom are harmful to health. The Government see no need to fund an increase in the programme.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to restrict the erection of high voltage overhead power cables near to occupied dwellings.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government have no plans to introduce new restrictions on the erection of high voltage overhead power lines near to occupied dwellings.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police National Computer

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now publish the report by the Police Complaints Authority on access by police officers to information stored on the police national computer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The report was published yesterday. It contains recommendations designed to strengthen the control of access by police officers to information stored on the police national computer. My Department will draw the report to the attention of all chief officers of police. In addition, its recommendations are being studied by the Police National Computer Board to determine what further action is required, in consultation with the Association of Chief Police Officers and with Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary, to ensure that misuse of the computer facility does not occur again.

I take this opportunity to record my thanks to the Police Complaints Authority for its valuable examination of this matter.

Prison Governors (Uniform)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for prison governors to wear uniform; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: This issue was raised in the report of the "Review of Management Structure in Prison Service Establishments", on which I hope to announce my intentions shortly.

Victim Support Scheme

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received regarding the victim support scheme.

Mr. Hurd: I have received representations from the parliamentary all-party penal affairs group and, through hon. Members, from a number of local victims support schemes seeking increased central Government funding for victims support. The National Association of Victims Support Schemes has also submitted comments on the White Paper "Criminal Justice: Plans for Legislation". The extent of Government support for local schemes was described in the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) on 24 April, at column 188. In addition, substantial help is given to the National Association of Victims Support Schemes.

Day Prisons

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received advocating the introduction of day prisons; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The parliamenary all-party penal affairs group has recently re-affirmed support for a system of intermittent custody. Most of the organisations which have commented on the Government's decision, announced in the recent White Paper on "Criminal Justice", not to introduce such a system have supported the Government's line.

Prison Officers Association

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's present discussions with the Prison Officers Association.

Mr. Hurd: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) on 14 May, at columns 464-66. I understand that the national executive committee of the Prison Officers' Association is arranging to ballot the association's members and will be recommending the calling-off of the industrial action: the ballot is likely to take place around the beginning of July and the result should be known about a week later.

Italian Terrorists (Extradition)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now take steps to deport Roberte Fiore and four other Italian nationals who have been convicted of terrorist offences in Italy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I am continuing to keep these cases under review.

Hull Prison

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people under the age of 21 years are on remand in Hull prison.

Mr. Hurd: On 17 June 1986 there were 131 untried prisoners aged under 21 in Her Majesty's prison and remand centre, Hull.

Mr. Norman William Davis

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the case of Mr. Norman William Davis, a prisoner detained at Featherstone prison, was considered by the local review committee; when the views of the judiciary were requested and received by his Department; when the case was referred to the Parole Board by his Department; when the case was considered by the Parole Board; when the recommendation of the Parole Board was received by his Department; and when he expects to take a decision on its recommendation.

Mr. Hurd: The information requested is as follows:

Date of local review committee consideration:
18 December 1984.
Date papers sent to judiciary:
18 December 1985.
Date papers received back from judiciary:
14 January 1986.
Date papers sent to the Parole Board:
21 May 1986.
Date case considered by the Parole Board:
4 June 1986.
Date recommendation received from Parole Board:
17 June 1986.

I would expect to consider the board's recommendation within the next fortnight.

Immigration

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to his answer of 12 June to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) Official Report, column 270 in which it was stated that the guidelines on immigration cases appear to be working satisfactorily, he will inquire into why the immigration service breached these guidelines on 13 June by informing Mr. Shahed Saleem at Ringway airport that he must return to Pakistan by 15 June, although at the time of this instruction Mr. Saleem's case was still under consideration by his Department and no decision on it had been communicated to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Member expressed his first interest in this case on the evening of 10 May, the day of the passenger's arrival. He asked that Mr. Saleem, who had not at that stage been refused entry, should be interviewed quickly, but that if further inquiries were needed these should be conducted at Manchester airport. The case was transferred to Manchester airport and the passenger was refused entry on 13 June. The chief immigration officer at Manchester was aware of the right hon. Member's earlier interest, but assumed, mistakenly, that this was confined to the initial delay in interviewing Mr. Saleem. Removal directions were accordingly set for 15 June. These were cancelled when the right hon. Member confirmed that he wished to make representations on the case. The chief immigration officer should have realised from the right hon. Member's earlier intervention that representations were likely to be submitted in the event of refusal of entry.

The action taken was not in my view a breach of the guidelines, but directions should not have been set without a check first being made about the right hon. Gentleman's possible wish to make representations, given his earlier involvement in the case.

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Agencies

35. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Paymaster General how many enterprise agencies now operate in Great Britain.

Mr. Trippier: There are currently 314 local enterprise agencies throughout Great Britain, of which 249 are approved under the terms of the 1982 Finance Act, which allows business sector sponsors tax relief on their contributions to such bodies.

Job Safety

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received in the last three months concerning job safety.

Mr. Trippier: Ministers in this Department have received 42 letters from industrialists, trades unions and members of the public concerning job safety over the last three months. On 8 May my right hon. and learned Friend met the Health and Safety Commission to discuss Crown immunity.

Training

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received from religious organisations which find that their members, for reasons of conscience, are unable to complete courses administered by the construction industry training board for the joint industry board for the electrical contracting industry.

Mr. Trippier: I have recently received a number of representations from members of religious organisations who feel that individuals with their beliefs cannot, in conscience, register as apprentices with the joint industry board for the electrical contracting industry. I have asked the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to draw the matter to the attention of the construction industry training board and the joint industry board to see whether a solution can be found which satisfies all parties concerned.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Paymaster General whether he will bring forward legislation to enable trainees, who for reasons of conscience, are unable to obtain grants or complete training schemes initiated by the Manpower Services Commission, to obtain some form of exemption in the pursuit of the relevant qualifications.

Mr. Trippier: No. I am concerned, however, that neither trainees' freedom to undertake training, nor financial support for training, should be restricted for these reasons. I have asked the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to look carefully at the small number of cases recently drawn to my attention where trainees have reported difficulties.

Retail Prices Index

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Paymaster General if fixed charges for energy supplies and water services are included when compiling the retail prices index; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Yes. Practically all goods and services on which households spend their money are covered by the retail prices index, including both fixed and unit charges for energy and other services.

Disabled People (Rehabilitation)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Paymaster General if Her Majesty's Government will now ratify International Labour Organisation convention 159 on the rehabilitation of disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In a White Paper (Cmnd. No. 9417) laid before Parliament on Friday 21 December 1984, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment announced the Government's decision not to ratify convention 159. The White Paper gave clear reasons why the Government were unable to proceed with ratification and the position remains unchanged.

Benefit Entitlement

Mr. Robin F. Cook asked the Paymaster General, further to the answer to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 19 May, Official Report, column 48, if he will state the last occasion when his Department issued instructions specifying members of a specific occupation or profession who were not to be advised on their entitlement to benefit.

Mr. Lang: It has not in the past been necessary to refer to specific occupational groups in connection with the standing instruction to which I referred in my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). The miner's position is unique in that a decision on the timing of their claim could effect not only benefit entitlement but also entitlement to payment under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. Their position was further complicated by the possible loss of national insurance contributions during the industrial dispute which ended in March 1985. It was particularly important, therefore, that this group of potential claimants were not misdirected.

Asbestos-related Diseases

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General how many persons have died from asbestos-related diseases in Scotland in each of the last five years.

Mr. Trippier: The following tables gives the numbers of death certificates which mention the asbestos-related diseases asbestosis mesothelioma. Some deaths involving mesothelioma may not be related to asbestos. The most recent figures are for 1984.

Death certificates mentioning asbestos-related diseases

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Scotland
Asbestosis without mesothelioma	13	18	10	13	9
Asbestosis with mesothelioma	1	3	3	2	2
Mesothelioma without asbestosis	52	53	50	44	54
Total	66	74	63	59	65

In addition, studies have shown that workers heavily exposed to asbestos in the past now suffer a significantly higher incidence of lung cancer than the general population. There are, however, no figures of the total numbers of asbsetos-related deaths from this disease.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

Mr. Madel asked the Paymaster General what plans he has to extend the technical and vocational education initiative courses to all secondary schools in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government are considering the wider application of the lessons emerging from the technical and vocational education initiative.

The Government's objective is that all young people should have the opportunity of following a more relevant and practical curriculum.

PRIME MINISTER

Indictable Offences

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister (1) what has been the rate of indictable offences per 1,000 population per annum in each of the last five years (a) in Great Britain and (b) in Northern Ireland; to what the difference is attributed; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what has been the rate of car thefts per 1,000 vehicles per annum in each of the last five years (a) in Great Britain and (b) Northern Ireland; to what the difference is attributed; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Comparisons of recorded crime in different parts of the United Kingdom can only be approximate because of differences in law and recording practice. Such figures as are available are given in the following table. It is not possible to attribute differences in recorded crime between Great Britain and Northern Ireland to any single cause. In Scotland the classification and recording practices are appreciably different, and few valid comparisons can be made.

Nuclear-free Zones

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East of 4 June, she will take steps to ensure the compilation and maintenace of a central list of local authorities which have declared a nuclear-free zone in their area; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Since we do not recognise the validity of so-called nuclear-free zones, the Government do not consider that it would be appropriate to require local authorities to provide information of this kind, nor that the expense involved would be justified.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Prime Minister if, in the light of its participation in the international expert meeting on legislation and equalisation of opportunities for disabled persons held in Vienna between 2 and 6 June, Her Majesty's Government will make a contribution to the United Nations trust fund for the decade of disabled persons; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We support the general aims of the United Nations world programme of action concerning disabled persons. However, it is not our intention to contribute to the voluntary fund for the United Nations decade of disabled persons. We prefer to support specific projects of benefit to the disabled directly through our bilateral aid programme.

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to ensure that the respective versions of the new code of conduct for European companies operating in South Africa currently being circulated by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department of Trade and Industry correspond exactly in their wording, with particular reference to the revised definition of minimum wage levels recently agreed by EEC Ministers; if she will make it the practice of Her Majesty's Government to use the version issued by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as the basis of its policy towards South Africa; what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to implement the code in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: All Government Departments are implementing the code as agreed by EC Foreign Ministers on 19 November 1985, a copy of which was deposited in the Library of the House. The Government are encouraging British companies with interests in South Africa to comply fully with the provisions of the revised code.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Sexual Offences (Prosecution)

Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what is the policy of his Department concerning the prosecution of cases of sexual offences where the complainers are children and there are no other witnesses available to give evidence.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The policy, as reflected in departmental regulations, is to treat all offences against young children, especially those at continuing risk, as matters of especial concern. Procurators Fiscal are directed to prosecute such offences without delay in the sheriff court or High Court.

Provided sufficient evidence in law is available, the public interest will usually require that such cases be prosecuted unless there are very good reasons for not so doing. Examples of such reasons might be that the accused person is himself a child, in which case his referral to the Reporter to the Children's Panel will be considered as an alternative to prosecution, and the possibility that the ordeal for the child of giving evidence would outweigh any advantage to be gained from a prosecution.

There is no minimum legal age limit for children as witnesses, but Procurators Fiscal must satisfy themselves that children are able to give credible and comprehensive evidence, and understand the obligation to speak the truth. Procurators Fiscal are advised to interview chidren themselves, if in doubt, on these questions. Provided at least two children satisfying these requirements are available to give evidence, a prosecution can take place. If individual children speak to similar conduct by the accused, albeit on different occasions, the rule in HMA v. Moorov may be applied to create a sufficiency of evidence.

Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many cases his Department has considered in each of the past seven years of allegations of sexual offences against children; and in how many such cases a decision has been taken not to proceed on the grounds that no prosecution witness would be available other than the child concerned.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The information is not held centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to collect and publish regular information concerning (a) the number of housing units disposed of by local authorities to private developers for refurbishment or redevelopment, (b) the number of housing units made available under such schemes (i) for fair rent, (ii) for sale under a low cost home ownership scheme and (iii) for sale at market value, (c) the number of housing units made available under such schemes which have subsequently been let to or purchased by (1) former tenants of the properties, (2) council tenants on the local authority's transfer list, (3) households on the local authority's waiting list and (4) homeless households; and (d) where the units refurbished or redeveloped are for sale, the resale price of the properties.

Sir George Young: Information will be collected quarterly, as from the current quarter, about the number of local authority dwellings sold to private developers or to housing associations for refurbishment and resale. Arrangements for publication have not yet been decided. I am considering whether regular information might also be collected about the subsequent use of such dwellings and, if appropriate, I shall consult the local authority associations.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research has been conducted by his Department into what existing local authority tenants would prefer their homes to be managed or owned by (a) housing associations, (b) building societies and (c) non-profit making trusts.

Sir George Young: As the preferences of tenants are bound to depend on the circumstances of a particular case, the primary need is for full consultation with the tenants concerned before any proposed scheme receives approval. At Thamesmead, tenants expressed a clear preference in a referendum for ownership and management by a non-profit distributing company controlled by the residents, as opposed to a trust controlled by the local authority. My Department is also carrying out research on the attitudes of tenants and owners who live in different types of co-operatives.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department has about the instance where local authority tenants have initiated a proposal that their landlord (a) delegate the management of their homes or (b) dispose of the ownership of their homes to (i) a housing association, (ii) a building society, (iii) a private trust or (iv) a private developer; and whether he can provide information on what results have arisen from any such proposal.

Sir George Young: Many local authority tenants are dissatisfied with the management of their homes, and would welcome either improved management by the local authority, or transfer of the ownership or management to them or to another body. The urban housing renewal unit in my Department is discussing with local authorities a wide range of options for their difficult-to-manage estates. However, it is the responsibility of local authorities to draw up specific proposals in consultation with their tenants.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what research his Department has conducted concerning (a) the inclination, (b) the capacity and (c) the experience of building societies to take over (i) the management and (ii) the ownership of local authority rented housing stock;

(2) what research his Department has conducted concerning (a) the inclination, (b) the capacity and (c)

the experience of housing associations to take over (i) the management and (ii) the ownership of local authority rented housing stock.

Sir George Young: The building societies have been examining how best they might use the new powers proposed in the Building Societies Bill and how they might be able to co-operate with the public sector in the improvement and better management of housing estates, while looking after the interests of their savers. We shall want to discuss the societies' ideas with local authorities and with housing associations. A study being carried out for my Department by the Centre for Housing Research at Glasgow university will collect information about the respective attitudes of local authority and housing association tenants to a wide range of housing management practices.

Gipsies

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many gipsies are estimated to be resorting to or residing in each of the countries in England; and when these estimates were made;

(2) whether he will list those local authorities which have caravan sites deemed to be adequate under the Caravan Sites Act 1968 and which do not;

(3) what information he has as to how many separate caravan sites have been provided in each county; and how many pitches are accommodated on those sites.

Mr. Tracey: At the January 1986 count of caravans conducted by district and London borough councils in England, a total of 10,592 gipsy caravans were recorded. The tables are placed in the House of Commons Library and contain detailed breakdowns by region, county and district. They record the numbers of caravans on authorised private gipsy sites in each authority's area, as well as on sites provided by the authorities themselves. A list of those local authority sites is also in the Library. The question whether individual sites are adequate at any given time is dependent on the circumstances at that time and in that place.

Caravan Sites

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities are designated under the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Tracey: The following local authority areas have been designated:

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will name those local authorities in respect of which his Department has had to use, or threatened the use of, his powers under section 9 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968; if he will give the relevant dates of such actions; and whether his directions were complied with.

Mr. Tracey: Discussions have taken place with a number of authorities about their gipsy site provision. All such discussions are with the knowledge that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has powers to direct. In no case has it yet been found necessary for the Secretary of State to issue directions.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the percentage of each consignment of typical spent thermal oxide nuclear fuel imported represented by (a) depleted uranium, (b) plutonium and (c) nuclear waste products.

Mr. Waldegrave: Fully irradiated thermal oxide fuel consists of approximately 96 per cent. uranium, 1 per cent. plutonium and 3 per cent. fission products and other actinides. It contains no depleted uranium.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will increase the amount of money available for all aspects of radioactive waste management research; and if he will increase the proportion of the budget that is allocated to geological studies in this respect .

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is only one of the funding bodies in the United Kingdom supporting research on radioactive waste management. The nuclear industry and UK NIREX Ltd. fund research in support of their waste management operations. From a stable overall research budget, my Department will be increasing the proportion allocated to disposal of wastes in order to fulfil its regulatory function in respect of proposals from UK NIREX Ltd. for solid waste disposal.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to increase the amount of research on nuclear waste disposal and its environmental consequences which the United Kingdom contributes to international research projects on this issue.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom, through my Department, is an active participant in several international research projects related to radioactive waste management. Recent years have seen a steady increase in the United Kingdom contribution to the Commission of the European Communities, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and other multilateral projects. This trend is expected to continue.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he plans to increase the length of time for which funds are allocated for radioactive waste research.

Mr. Waldegrave: Contracts for research related to radioactive waste are let for whatever time is needed to meet the research objectives. Most contracts are for one or two years, but some cover research for up to five years when necessary.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he plans to initiate any geological fieldwork studies to complement any theoretical evidence that he may have concerning the effects of the geological environment on radio-nucleide dispersal.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has commissioned a three-year programme of geological and geochemical fieldwork studies related to movement of natural and man-made radioactivity in geological media. These studies will complement the research carried out by UK Nirex Ltd, and research in other countries. They are primarily concerned with observation of long-term processes and with testing the prediction methods used in assessing the safety of geological disposal of radioactive waste.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to commission any geological studies on the siting and construction of radioactive-waste repositories.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is the responsibility of UK Nirex Ltd. to commission geological studies on the siting and construction of repositories for low and intermediate-level radioactive waste. My Department has a substantial research programme to support its policy and regulatory responsibilities, part of which is concerned with the safety of geological disposal radioactive wastes.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to publish his Department's response to the remainder of the Environment Committee's report on radioactive waste.

Mr. Ridley: As soon as possible.

Co-operatives

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider the provision of special assistance to the London Co-operative Enterprise Board Limited to enable it to process outstanding applications from groups wishing to create their own employment by setting up worker co-operative enterprises.

Sir George Young: This is a matter for the London boroughs, from which the board has sought support.

Hippy Convoy

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the peace convoy and other similar groups with a nomadic habit of life have been included in the official estimates of the numbers of gipsies resorting to or residing in each county.

Mr. Tracey: The official estimates relate to the numbers of gipsy caravans and are provided twice-yearly by district and London borough councils. Caravans belonging to individuals whom the authorities accept as of the nomadic habit of life referred to in the Caravan Sites Act 1968 should normally be included. Groups such as the peace convoy would not normally be included.

Housing Defects

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to complete his review of the £14,000 expenditure limit for repairs to property under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction announced on 3 June the Government's proposals for revising the expenditure limit for repairs under the housing defects legislation. My Department is currently consulting local authority associations and other interested bodies on those proposals, with a view to bringing new limits into force by the end of August.

Insurance (Inner Cities)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to deal with the problem in inner city areas of obtaining insurance cover for business premises.

Sir George Young: My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General is collating information from the city action teams on the difficulty of obtaining insurance cover in inner city areas, including Lambeth, with a view to discussing the problem with the insurance industry.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the figures for total sulphur dioxide emissions in the United Kingdom for each of the past 10 years; and if he will break down each yearly figure by the following sources (a) power stations, (b) refineries, (c) other industrial sources, (d) transport, (e) agriculture, (f) commercial and public services and (g) domestic.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is published annually in my Department's "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library. The figures for 1975 to 1984 are as follows:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

Water Authorities (Rivers)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for each water authority for each year since 1979, the lengths of class 3 (poor) and 4 (bad) rivers, in kilometres.

Mrs. Rumbold: The lengths of class 3 (poor) and 4 (bad) rivers are published each year by the water authorities in their annual reports, and collectively by the Water Authorities Association. My Department also publishes this information as part of its statistical publication, the "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics," as additional table F12, the latest version of which is reproduced.

Notes

The classification of rivers follows that set out in the National Water Council's report "River quality—the 1980 survey and future outlook". Poor quality rivers are those which are polluted to such an extent that fish are absent or sporadically present. Such rivers may be used for low-grade industrial abstraction purposes. Bad quality rivers are those which are grossly polluted and are likely to cause a nuisance.

The Table is based on monitoring performed by individual water authorities and in some cases the lengths of rivers monitored differs from the national surveys, and so the results cannot be directly compared.

Greater Manchester Residuary Body

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will require the Greater Manchester residuary body under schedule 13(10) to the Local Government Act 1985 to furnish him with information relating to the circumstances in which the loss of keys to a cabinet has led to a failure to provide information to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton in relation to a constituent's claim for compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I shall write to the right hon. Member.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Job Creation

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many jobs have been created within Northern Ireland in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The information is not available in the exact form requested. However, the numbers of jobs promoted by the various industrial development agencies in Northern Ireland in each of the past 10 years were as follows:

	Department of Commerce/ Industrial Development Board	Local Enterprise Development Unit	Totals
1976	2,904	774	3,678
1977	4,647	1,226	5,873

Tourism

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many tourists have visited Northern Ireland in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The information required is a s follows:

	Numbers
1976	432,000
1977	503,000
1978	628,000
1979	728,000
1980	710,000
1981	583,000
1982	712,000
1983	865,000
1984	908,000
1985	863,000

Visitor numbers have doubled since 1976. The slight fall in 1985 was due to fewer visitors from the Republic of Ireland, which I understand was in turn largely attributable to economic and fiscal factors. Northern Ireland is an attractive and welcoming place for holidaymakers and business men.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total cost to public funds of the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr. Tom King: The Northern Ireland Assembly cost about £2·8 million last year and £3·5 million has been allocated this year. However, the Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order was laid on 17 June and is to be debated shortly. If approved, the total cost of the Assembly to public funds in the current year will be considerably less than this.

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be the position of the Clerk and other staff of the Northern Ireland Assembly after dissolution; and how Parliament building will be used in future.

Mr. Tom King: The Clerk to the Assembly will continue to hold statutory office under section 24(3) of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973 after dissolution. The position of other Assembly staff and the future use of Parliament building are under consideration at present, but I hope it will not be long before a new Assembly is playing a responsible and valuable role in Northern Ireland.

Parliament Building, Stormont (Library)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will define the functions of the Library in the Parliament building at Stormont; and who is entitled to use it.

Mr. Tom King: The Library exists primarily to provide library and information services for Members and staff of the Northern Ireland Assembly. It also acts as a reference library for Northern Ireland Government Departments, which would continue to use it after dissolution of the Assembly.

WALES

Patients (Statistics)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many in-patients there are in hospitals for the mentally handicapped in Wales; and what was the comparable figure five years ago.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There were 1,880 resident patients at mental handicap hospitals and units in Wales on 31 December 1985, the latest date for which information is available. The comparable figure for 1980 was 2,224.

Surgical Treatment

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of patients receiving surgical treatment in Wales in (a) 1979 and (b) the latest year for which complete figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The number of surgical operations carried out in Wales in 1979 was 122,702. The comparable figure for 1984, the latest year for which information is available, was 175,939.

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the average return rates for patients after receiving surgical treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available centrally.

Health Authorities

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what calculations were used to determine the provision for the cost of petrol, oil, heating oil, electricity and gas for the health authorities in Wales in 1986-87; and what was the financial allocation for each of those commodities.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No specific provision was made for these or any other individual commodities in health authorities' allocations.

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what calculations were used to determine the provision for the cost of inflation for the health authorities in Wales in 1986-87; and what was the consequent financial allocation.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In determining allocations to district health authorities in Wales in 1986-87, account was taken of the 4·5 per cent. forecast of inflation for 1986 required by the Industry Act 1975, together with estimates of the authorities' capacity to release additional resources through efficiency savings, the generation of income and the realisation of receipts from the sale of land. On this basis, cash allocations amounting to £659·7 million in revenue and £21·4 million capital were issued to DHAs in Wales at the beginning of 1986-87 and a further £14·0 million revenue and £24·8 million capital was allocated for centrally financed services and developments including expenditure incurred by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority and community health councils. Since then price inflation has fallen well below the forecast level and is continuing to fall and this has been taken into account in determining the additional £3·1 million revenue provision which was recently made available to DHAs in Wales in respect of the costs of implementing the 1986 review bodies' pay recommendations.

Radiation

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what evaluations he has made of the greatest causes of natural radiation to which the people of Wales are exposed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what evaluations he has made of the greatest causes of man-made radiation to which the people of Wales are exposed; what proportion of this is emissions from medical X-ray equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The National Radiological Protection Board has advised that almost 87 per cent. of the radiation to which people in Wales are exposed comes from natural sources. While there are local variations, the sources of natural radiation in order of decreasing contributions to the total average dose are radon and thoron in air, terrestrial gamma rays, internal radiation naturally in the human body and cosmic rays. Most of the radiation from man made sources comes from medical procedures and is due almost entirely to the use of X-ray equipment.

GCSE Examination

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what additional financial resources are now to be made available in Wales preparations for the general certificate of secondary education examination; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Wales will benefit to the extent of £1·2 million from the additional resources for books and equipment which the Government are making available to local authorities in the current financial year.

Singleton Hospital

Mr. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, in view of the restrictions on the use of X-ray facilities at the casualty unit at Singleton hospital, he will provide the basis for his statement that access to these facilities will be determined by the clinical need prevailing at the time.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Access to X-ray facilities will be as set out in the West Glamorgan health authority's proposals for the Singleton minor casualty unit which were approved on 5 March. Those stated that it would be for:

3.1 Those who need to be referred to the specialist services of ophthalmology and ENT at Singleton hospital;

3.2 Where, for urgent clinical reasons, reference to Morriston hospital is clearly inappropriate.

Thus the clinical need is a matter for judgment by the clinician dealing with each case.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the Welsh Development Agency budget was spent in each Welsh district during the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Development Agency does not maintain details of expenditure in the form requested.

Housing

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what number of houses is owned by local authorities in each of the parliamentary constituencies in Wales; and what proportion of the housing stock these figures represent.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The number and percentage of households renting accommodation from a local authority or new town in each parliamentary constituency at the time of the 1981 census is shown in the following table. No information is held relating to the number of local authority owned dwellings in each parliamentary constituency.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many holiday or second homes there are in each parliamentary constituency in Wales; and what proportion of the housing stock they represent.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The number and percentage of household spaces recorded as second residence or holiday accommodation for each parliamentary constituency at the 1981 census is given in the following table.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if his Department holds information on the name and address of every community council clerk in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Department maintains a list of the names and addresses of all community council clerks.

Drinking Water (Tests)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for each year since 1980, the information he has as to (a) the total number of samples of potable water tested by the Welsh water authority, (b) the number of those samples containing coliform organisms and (c) the number of those samples containing E coli, distinguishing in each case between samples taken shortly after treatment and samples taken from the distribution network.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is given in the annual water quality reports of the Welsh water authority from which the data given below have been abstracted.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Eastern Europe

5. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his latest estimate of the value of manufactures of east European origin passing to the United Kingdom through West Germany.

Mr. Alan Clark: No reliable estimate is available.

Regional Policy

10. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes he is currently considering to his Department's regional policy.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department is currently carrying out a review of the administration of regional policy in order to ensure that the schemes operate with the maximum effect and economy.

Footwear (China)

18. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the footwear industry regarding import quotas from China.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have received letters from several right hon. and hon. Members covering requests from the Lancashire Footwear Manufacturers Association and some of its members for discussions with my Department about possible changes in these quota arrangements.

Motor Vehicle Industry

19. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for the future of the motor vehicle industry in Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our policies will continue to be aimed at ensuring that the United Kingdom vehicle industry, and indeed the component industry, achieves the competitiveness necessary to ensure its long-term future.

Systime plc, Leeds

20. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review his Department's current financial commitments towards Systime plc, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Department has reached agreement in principle with the company on the settlement of outstanding commitments. I have no plans to review the position further.

Research and Technology Scheme

21. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about his Department's small firms merit award for research and technology scheme for small firms.

Mr. Pattie: The purpose of the small firms merit award for science and technology, which I announced on 30 April, is to support particularly promising and innovative technological projects from small firms and individuals.

I hope that it will prove to be effective as a source of seed corn finance to help realise the considerable potential of our innovators.

Think British Campaign

22. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to provide financial support for the Think British Campaign.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We very much welcome the initiative shown by the Think British Campaign and are discussing with it how we might support its plans for promoting British goods of good design and high quality, consistent with our international obligations.

Rolls-Royce

23. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has recently received on the Government's proposals to privatise Rolls-Royce.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations opposing the company's privatisation. The company's board has confirmed its strong desire to see the company returned to the private sector.

Copyright

24. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from the Arts Council and the Royal Academy about statutory exceptions to the basic rule at to first ownership of copyright in commissioned works of art; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: A letter from the chairman of the Arts Council was received last week setting out the view of that body and the Royal Academy of Art that section 4(3) of the Copyright Act 1956 should be repealed. Section 4(3) provides that, subject to agreement to the contrary, the copyright in a commissioned photograph, painted or drawn portrait or an engraving belongs to the commissioner and not the artist.

As announced in the recent White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation", the Government have concluded that it is unnecessary and undersirable to amend either the basic ownership provision or the existing specific exception covering commissioned works. We will, however, look at the matter again in the light of these representations.

30. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will seek to incorporate into United Kingdom law the provision of article 2(6) of the Paris text of the Berne convention relating to copyright protection for the authors of commissioned portraits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Section 4 of the Copyright Act 1956 is consistent with article 2(6) of the Paris text of the Berne convention. No further provision is therefore required.

31. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received in response to the White Paper entitled, "Intellectual Property and Innovation".

Mr. Pattie: The Government have so far received approximately 90 written representations in response to the White Paper "Intellectual Property and Innovation". The White Paper makes proposals for reforming the law relating to copyright and designs and for improving the way in which the United Kingdom's intellectual property system operates as a whole. Many of the representations received are therefore very wide-ranging.

Leyland Bus

25. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the managing director of Leyland Bus to discuss the future of the company.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I met the managing director of Leyland Bus on 16 June. I intend to visit both the Workington and Leyland Bus plants on June 27.

Small Firms

26. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he plans to seek to make any changes in the accountancy rules for small businesses.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend announced recently that in the light of the consultation carried out by my Department last year the Government intend to relax the rules governing the amount of information small companies are required to disclose in their accounts. Details of the changes proposed will be announced as soon as possible.

Leyland Vehicles Ltd.

27. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future prospects of Leyland Vehicles Ltd.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The three potential bidders for Leyland Bus have been invited to submit offers by 26 June on a tender basis with a recommendation to Government as soon as possible thereafter. The position regarding Leyland Trucks remain as announced in my right hon. Friend's statement on 25 March.

Bogus Business Directories

28. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received recent representations on bogus business directories.

Mr. Pattie: Since December 1985 my Department has received 87 complaints about unsolicited offers for advertising in business telex directories. Most complaints have been about the activities of one particular company based in Lichtenstein.

Confederation of British Industry

29. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the chairman of the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend met CBI leaders at the National Economic Development Council on 4 June, when European issues were discussed.

Foreign Investment

32. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many jobs he estimates were created in the United Kingdom as a result of foreign investment during the past year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Department estimates that, as a result of the inward investment decisions notified to the Invest in Britain Bureau within 1985, over 21,000 jobs will be created and many more have been safeguarded.

USSR

33. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to discuss with his Soviet counterpart the question of increasing trade between the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend hopes to meet the Soviet Minister for Foreign Trade, Mr. Aristov, in October if he comes, as invited, to the 70th Anniversary of the British-Soviet chamber of commerce. In any case, I would expect to hold discussions about increasing trade with the USSR with Mr. Aristov at the next session of the Joint Commission in 1987.

General Motors

34. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received any further information from General Motors regarding its future policy towards their commercial vehicle operations in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The future of General Motors' commercial vehicle operations here remain a matter for the company's own commercial judgment. I understand, however, that the company is reviewing its strategies in the light of difficult world trading conditions.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Alan Clark: The numbers of appearances of witnesses before Select Committees of the House of Commons in the Sessions of 1983-84 and 1984-85 were as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85
Ministers	4	3
Officials	23	21

Semi-conductor Chips

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the rate of duty or tax payable upon the importation of (a) assembled semi-conductor chips and (b) the unassembled components of semi-conductor chips; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The rate of duty under the common customs tariff on semi-conductor devices, whether or not encapsulated in a housing, is 14 per cent. Diffused silicon wafers not yet cut into chips attract a duty rate of 9 per cent. The rates of duty charged on the other parts of semi-conductor chips, for example gold wire, connectors and certain ceramic, metallic and plastic compounds range from 0·5 to 10 per cent.

The Government have for some time been concerned at the burden which the duty rate on semi-conductors imposes on the electronic components industry. There is a considerable disincentive to assemble these components in the Community created by the lower duties of 4 or 4·9 per cent. payable on assemblies of two or more of these devices mounted on printed circuit boards for use in data processing equipment. Consequently, the Government have pressed strongly within the Community for a large reduction in this duty. Despite considerable opposition from several member states the United Kingdom has secured a reduction in the duty on semi-conductors from 17 to 14 per cent. from 1 January 1986.

The Government remain committed to seeking a further large reduction in this duty rate in the new GATT round of multilateral trade negotiations expected to be launched in September.

Bankruptcies and Liquidations

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the monthly totals of bankruptcies and company liquidations in January and July for each of the last eight years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is given in the table:

South Africa (Code of Conduct)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on whose authority the word living has been removed from the phrase minimum living level in the version of the new code of conduct for EEC firms operating in South Africa, currently being circulated by his Department; what action he proposes to take to restore the original wording; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Textiles

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the progress of negotiations in the general agreement on tariffs and trade textiles committee.

Mr. Alan Clark: There was a meeting of the GATT textiles committee in Geneva on 5 June. Further meetings will be held in July in order to conclude negotiations before the end of that month. The European Commission is conducting the negotiations on behalf of the Community, in accordance with the mandate approved by the Council of Ministers on 11 March. It has also begun parallel bilateral discussions with its supplier countries. I will continue to keep in close touch with the industry and other interested parties as the negotiations progress. I have every expectation that the outcome will conform to the Community's negotiating mandate.

Companies (Local Amenities)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require companies who employ in excess of 1,000 people at any one location to include in their annual report a report on their contacts with, and assistance to, local amenities.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Goods

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts are made to exploit the potential of British embassies abroad for commercial purposes where British goods are concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Where suitable facilities exist at British embassies and heads of missions residences, they can be made available for the promotion of British goods and services, through displays, exhibitions and seminars. For example, embassies and residences in Paris, Rome, Copenhagen, The Hague, Vienna and Washington are regularly used for this purpose.

Iranian Arms Team

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the United States Government regarding the activities of the Iranian arms procurement team in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: It is not our policy to comment in detail on discussions with other Governments. We are in close regular contact with the United States authorities on all aspects of the Iran/Iraq conflict, including the supply of defence equipment. The activities of Iranian military procurement personnel based in London are the subject of close scrutiny; action would be taken were any evidence to come to light of infringement of our strict guidelines on the supply of military equipment from the United Kingdom to Iran and Iraq.

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the wording of the copies of the new code of conduct for European firms operating in South Africa currently being circulated by his Department, in so far as the definition of the minimum wage level agreed recently by EEC Foreign Ministers is concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: All Government Departments are implementing the new code of conduct as agreed by EC Foreign Ministers on 19 November 1985. The text corresponds exactly with what was agreed by Ministers, and a copy is available in the Library of the House. The version first made available to the public contained a misquote from the previous code. This has now been corrected.

Falkland Islands

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many tourists have visited the Falkland islands; what was their mode of travel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Detailed statistics of all individual tourists who have visited the Falklands are not readily available. During the past Falklands summer season three cruise ships disembarked 299 passengers, and since the completion of Mount Pleasant airport in May 1985, 32 tourists have travelled by air. Five air tours operators have firm plans to send groups totalling about 170 people during the next southern hemisphere summer. The Falkland Islands Development Corporation is engaged in a project to expand tourist facilities. This should attract a growing number of visitors; and reduced air fares will be available from 1 July.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council on 16 and 17 June.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend attended the Foreign Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 16 June. My hon. Friend the Minister for Trade represented the United Kingdom at the continuing discussions on 17 June.

The Council discussed preparations for the meeting of the European Council on 27-28 June.

The Council discussed the dispute with the United States over the trade implications of enlargement. Ministers agreed to work for a negotiated solution in the framework of the GATT as quickly as possible while also deciding in principle to meet any further United States restrictive actions by equivalent Community measures. The Council reaffirmed the Community's commitment to the new GATT round and to its successful and speedy launching, and also welcomed the overall approach proposed by the Commission.

The Council considered a revised mandate for negotiations with the Community's Mediterranean preferential partners to take account of enlargement. Ministers agreed that the Presidency would propose to the Turkish Government that a meeting of the EC/Turkey Association Council should be held in the margins of the September Foreign Affairs Council.

The Council agreed that the Commission should open negotiations with Venezuela on a voluntary restraint agreement (VRA) on its steel exports to the Community.

The Council confirmed the adoption as a resolution of the Commission's proposal on renal dialysis. There was a brief discussion on state aids for coal.

Meeting in political co-operation, Ministers had a brief discussion of South Africa and agreed to ask political directors to convene at the earliest possible date to evaluate the present situation in the light of the Commonwealth EPG report.

TRANSPORT

BR (Locomotive Purchases)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of proposed locomotive purchases that British Rail intends to make in 1986-87 and each subsequent years to 1990.

Mr. David Mitchell: Investment approval has been given for the following purchases of locomotives in the period 1986-87 to 1990-91.

	Number
Class 91	31
Class 87/2	60
Class 58	9

The phasing of the purchase is a matter of management for BR. BR may wish to purchase more locomotives during the period, but I have not received further proposals yet.

Cammel Weyman Metro Bus

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, following the accidents in London on 26 April and in Hull on 7 June, he will establish an inquiry into the possibilities of surge in Cammel Weyman Metro Buses at low acceleration due to the use of inhibitors on the drive and throttle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Department has conducted initial inquiries into these two accidents, both of which are still under investigation by the police.

"Highway Code"

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has reached a decision on his proposed revision of the "Highway Code"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend has today laid before Parliament proposed revisions to the "Highway Code" which take into account the many observations made by those who replied to our consultation letter of 21 March.

The proposed alterations include a number of changes which will benefit cyclists and which acknowledge the contribution that cycling organisations are making to the Department's thinking on road safety. Other subjects covered include child safety in cars, alcohol and the road user, the use of car telephones and additional information for motor cyclists and pedestrians. These alterations reflect current best practice in road safety. I hope that Parliament will find them acceptable.

European Air Fares

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is yet in a position to say what action the Government propose to take in response to the recent European Court of Justice ruling on European air fares.

Mr. Moore: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has already said, the Government welcome the judgment, which confirms our view, that air transport within the Community is subject to the competition rules of the treaty of Rome.

I recognise that there is widespread interest in the judgment because it paves the way for ending restrictive practices in European aviation. The court's ruling makes it clear that the Council of Ministers must now put a major effort into adoption, under article 87 of the treaty, of a comprehensive regulation robustly applying the competition rules to air transport in the Community. The Government believe that this is by far the best way forward and we will give high priority during our forthcoming Presidency to achieving this as part of a liberalising package.

The Government are, however, very conscious of the fact that the court has confirmed that, in the absence of such a regulation, it is up to member states to make sure that the competition rules are obeyed in the aviation sector. The Government are reviewing the machinery and procedures necessary to enable us to apply the competition rules between the United Kingdom and other member states, so as to ensure that Community rules are effectively applied in accordance with article 88, particularly if it proves impossible to achieve satisfactory agreement in the Council. In that event, I shall make a further statement about the details of these arrangements.

Channel Tunnel

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if British Rail will have enough capacity to run passenger services from and via London to the proposed Channel tunnel without building extra track; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail has informed Ministers that it has sufficient capacity to meet its expectation of demand with the assistance of the facilities covered by the Channel Tunnel Bill, and minor track improvements and resignalling.

Aberdeen Airport (Incident)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take in the light of the report by the accident investigation board into an incident at Aberdeen airport in February 1986; if he will have discussions on the matter with the appropriate authorities regarding safety on landing or take off by aircraft when runway lights are necessary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 11 June 1986, c. 192]: As civil aviation safety is solely the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority, I have asked the chairman of the authority to write to my hon. Friend.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Jopling: The information requested is as follows:

Session	Evidence to Commons Select Committees from: Ministers	Officials
1983-84	2	6
1984-85	3	18

Butter

Mr. Walters asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much butter has been sold by the European Commission at preferntial rates to non-profit-making organisations in the United Kingdom during 1985, or the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: No provision exists for the sale by the European Commission of intervention butter at preferential rates to non-profit-making organisations. But provision is made under regulation No. (EEC) 2191/81 for the payment of a subsidy on open market butter purchased by such organisations. During 1985 subsidy was paid on 5,940 tonnes of butter purchased by non-profit-making organisations in the United Kingdom.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Monetary System

Mr. Bruce asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he discussed the possibility of Britain joining the European monetary system at the Tokyo economic summit.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The United Kingdom is already a member of the European monetary system, but neither this nor the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system was on the agenda at the economic summit.

HM Customs and Excise

Mr. Evennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what advice has been issued to officials of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise involved in interviewing those who may be charged with a criminal offence since the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into force.

Mr. Brooke: Relevant provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and of codes of practice issued under the Act have been incorporated into the standing instructions issued to officers of Customs and Excise.

HMSO Bookshops (Cardiff and London)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the publications of HMSO were available (a) one day earlier, (b) two days earlier, (c) three days earlier and (d) more than three days earlier at the HMSO bookshop in London than in Cardiff since the HMSO bookshop there was closed.

Mr. Brooke: I regret that the information requested is not available.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Housing Benefit

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage of domestic ratepayers in each local authority who receive housing benefit.

Mr. Major: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, a table giving estimates of the average number of rate rebate recipients (based on local and regional authorities' subsidy claims for 1985-86) as a proportion of the number of domestic hereditaments (subjects in Scotland) at April 1985 has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the most recent annual estimate of take-up of standard housing benefit, housing benefit supplement and supplemenatry benefit among retirement pensioners; and what is the estimated total amount remaining unclaimed in each of these three categories.

Mr. Major: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Child Minders

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that the present two-thirds expenses rule for child minders will not be altered when the Social Security Bill is implemented.

Mr. Newton: There are currently different rules for the assessment of earnings from child minding in the supplementary benefit, housing benefit and family income supplement schemes. The Government will examine the future treatment of such earnings in the light of their general desire to introduce wherever possible a uniform approach to common issues for the three income-related benefits proposed in the Social Security Bill.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if single parents who will receive income support will continue to have an allowance made for reasonable child minding expenses under the current supplementary benefit scheme.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 3 March at columns 60-61.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how his proposals on future arrangements for supplementary benefit mortgage interest will affect students.

Mr. Newton: The mortgage interest proposals, which were referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee on 15 May, do not include any special provisions for students. Anyone aged under 60 will have 50 per cent. of his mortgage interest repayment included in his assessment initially and for up to 26 weeks of his supplementary benefit payments. Thereafter, should he still be receiving benefit, the full interest repayment will be included. Separate proposals referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee on 7 January provide that most students will not qualify for supplementary benefit except during the summer vacation.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will establish free entitlement to sterilisation operations for women who have been found to be HTLV-III antibody positive and who have been advised not to have children, irrespective of age, marital status and number of children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Sterilisation operations are already available on the National Health Service both for family planning and for medical reasons.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will identify for 1985 and 1986 the specific funding dedicated to acquired immune deficiency syndrome, broken down under the following headings: (a) basic medical research, (b) education and (c) community care.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that information is not held centrally in the form requested. However, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) on 24 February at columns 410-411. The resources mentioned in the reply are in addition to the money which health authorities and other ogranisations have themselves allocated to AIDS-related work.

Surgical Treatment (Return Rates)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the average return rates for patients after receiving surgical treatment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks. It is not held centrally.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a priority of reducing waiting lists; and if he will tell the next chairman of the National Health Service management board to make a priority of reducing waiting lists.

Mr. Hayhoe: The reduction of the time patients have to wait for treatment is a priority for the National Health Service management board and for health authorities.

Hospitals (West Midlands)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate and identify the number of hospitals in the west midlands health region which have been opened since 1979 and the number which have been closed.

Mr. Whitney A significant number of new hospitals have opened in the west midlands region since 1979, often replacing units which have outgrown their usefulness. Not all of the information requested is available centrally, however, and my hon. Friend may care to write to the chairman of West Midlands regional health authority for a complete answer.

Hospitals (Theft)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the annual amount of theft from National Health Service hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Returns from health authorities do not isolate losses from hospitals due to theft. Losses of cash and stores from health authorities due to theft, fraud or other culpable causes, recorded in the summarised accounts for the 1984-85 financial year, were £1·04 million.

It is essential that Health Service managers take cost-effective measures to minimise losses of Health Service goods from what ever source. This is why the Department asked all health authorities to draw up security strategies, which they have now done, and to introduce better control procedures. The National Health Service security manual, prepared by the National Association of Health Authorities, gives practical advice on action to prevent losses.

NHS Staff (Hertfordshire)

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many employees of the National Health Service in administrative grades worked within Hertfordshire (a) on the last available date before the abolition of the Hertfordshire area hospital authority and (b) on the most recent available date.

Mr. Whitney: The figures shown in the table relate to staff in post on (a) 30 September 1981, and (b) 30 September 1985 (provisional). Due to the effects of the 1982 National Health Service reorganisation, figures for 1981 and 1985 may not be directly comparable.

‡ Figures for 1985 exclude Family Practitioner Committee Staff, since FPCs received independent status on 1 April 1985.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is set out in the table. Some officials and Ministers appeared on more than one occasion and the higher figures for total appearances are shown in parentheses.

Commons Select Committees—1983-84 Session

(a) Number of officials who appeared: 33 (48)

(b) Number of Ministers who appeared: 2 (5)

(a) Number of officials who appeared: 55 (73)

(b) Number of Ministers who appeared: 5 (8)

Benefits

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if there are any sources of information that officials from his Department may not take into account when assessing a claimant's benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Decisions on claims for social security benefits are made by independent adjudication officers using information put to them by officials acting for the Secretary of State. Officials may gather from any source readily available information which they consider relevant but it is the adjudication officer's function to assess the relevance and reliability of any information or evidence in making his decision. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind he may care to write to me.

Community Care

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what response he proposes to make to the letter from the chairman of the social services committee of the Association of County Councils dated 3 March written on behalf of the Association of County Councils and a number of national voluntary organisations, drawing his attention to a statemet of principles for the achievement of community care policies, and seeking a meeting.

Mr. Fowler: I have agreed to meet representatives of the association and of the voluntary organisations.

Criminal Offences

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice has been issued to officials of his Department involved in interviewing those who may be charged with a criminal offence since the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into force.

Mr. Major: Guidance issued to fraud investigators in the Department reflects those parts of the codes of practice issued under sections 66 and 67 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which deal with treatment and questioning. This guidance is available on request both to suspects and to members of the public generally: I am placing copies in the Library.

In addition, detailed guidance which takes into account the relevant provisions contained in the Act and the associated codes of practice has been incorporated in the Department's operational instructions to fraud investigators.

In Vitro Fertilisation and Embryology

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his policy towards in vitro fertilisation and embryological research, in the light of the first report of the Voluntary Licensing Authority for Human In Vitro Fertilisation and Embryology, a copy of which has been forwarded to him.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on 28 April at column 276.

War Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by what percentage the war pensions budget has been reduced in each of the last five years due to the deaths of war pensioners and war widows; and if he has made any estimate of the likely reduction in 1986-87.

Mr. Major: There have been no reductions in the war pensions budget over the last five years. Although the number of war pensioners and war widows has been decreasing—by 18 per cent. over the period 1980-81 to 1985-86—this has been more than offset by the effect of annual upratings and by real improvements to the structure of the benefit. Expenditure per beneficiary was 19 per cent. higher in real terms at the end of the period than at the beginning.

On the assumptions underlying the 1986 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9702, Vol. II, part 3.15), expenditure on war pensions will be 2 per cent. higher in 1986-87 than in 1985-86, despite a 3·4 per cent. fall in the number of beneficiaries.

Shellfish Purification

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has funded any research into the efficacy of existing methods of shellfish purification; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Department is currently funding relevant studies at the central public health laboratory, London, on heat inactivation of hepatitis A virus in shellfish. The results of these studies are not expected for some time. I understand that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is also conducting research into the purification of shellfish.

Drugs (Side-effects)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has received representations on the failure of general practitioners to provide advice to patients of the side-effects of prescribed drugs.

Mr. Hayhoe: No such representations have been received. Doctors use their clinical judgment and discretion in deciding what to tell each patient. There is no requirement for doctors to give patients any details about the nature of the drugs prescribed for them.

ENERGY

British Coal

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if his Department has had any discussions with the National Coal Board about changes in section 46 of the Coal Industry Act 1946; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Potassium Iodate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all occasions that potassium iodate or other iodine compounds have been issued to workers or civilians at or around nuclear stations in the United Kingdom; what dosage was administered on each occasion; and if he will give details of any side effects recorded.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Warheads (Deterioration)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many reports he has received detailing physical deterioration in Her Majesty's Government's stock of nuclear warheads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: I have received no such reports. British nuclear warheads are designed to be safe and serviceable. Their planned withdrawal from service for inspection and periodic maintenance ensures that this aim is met.

Asbestos (Donnington)

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the trade unions will be able to nominate the contractor to carry out the independent check of the air for asbestos in connection with the re-roofing contract of the F1 building at Donnington as promised by the commanding officer.

Mr. Lee: Due to the imminence of re-roofing work on building F1 at COD Donnington, the contract to monitor air for asbestos was put out to tender. Five firms, recommended by the Health and Safety Executive, submitted tenders and the contract was subsequently placed with Occupational Health Services Limited of Wolverhampton. The trade unions have been advised of the contractor selected.

Naval Ships (Video Recordings)

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Defence why, when Her Majesty's ships are in port in Great Britain or within the three-mile limit video recordings cannot be played where the recording system is one relayed from a central source whereas they can be played if the playback is of an individual system; if he will take steps to permit video recordings to be played back on board Her Majesty's ships at all times, irrespective of the source of the playing back; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I shall reply shortly.

Household Division (Recruitment)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Army's policy regarding geographical and ethnic recruitment to the Household Division.

Mr. Freeman: Geographical recruiting areas for the regiments of the Household Division are as follows:

Life Guards
Blues and Royals
Great Britain and Ireland

Grenadier Guards
Coldstream Guards
Cover every English county between them

Scots Guards:
Scotland, Cumbria, Isle of Man, Lancashire, Corby, Darlington.

Irish Guards:
Ireland, Greater London, Merseyside, Birmingham, Manchester.

Welsh Guards:
Wales, Hereford, Cheshire

Selection to the Household Division is on merit alone. Ethnic origin is an irrelevant factor in the selection process.

Procurement Expenditure (Scotland)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the percentage share of procurement expenditure on equipment purchased from Scotland in each of the past four financial years.

Mr. Lee: We estimate that the approximate proportion of defence equipment procurement expenditure spent in Scotland was as follows:

	per cent.
1982-83	7
1983-84	6
1984-85	6
1985-86	6

These figures are for direct payments to main contractors and do not take account of payments made to subcontractors in Scotland. Expenditure on international collaborative projects is also excluded from these figures.

Endeavour Rifle

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence why is the L85A1 Endeavour rifle late entering service.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: The L85A1 Endeavour rifle is currently entering service with the Army's training organisation, although volume production has not yet been achieved.

Torpedo Programme

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the torpedo programme.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: Since the PAC reported on the torpedo programme last year there has been significant progress, including (a) the placing on 3 January 1986 of a fixed price contract on Marconi Underwater Systems Ltd. for main production of the lightweight Sting Ray torpedo; (b) the development of the Spearfish heavyweight torpedo has continued within the fixed price contract; (c) there has been notable improvement in the performance of the heavyweight Tigerfish torpedo.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the Tigerfish heavyweight torpedo ws originally due to enter service; what are the reasons for the delay; and how much the programme is over its original budget.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986]: It was originally expected that Tigerfish would commence service in 1967; due to development and engineering problems a limited version did not enter service until 1974. As the PAC was informed on 14 May this year, the performance of Tigerfish has notably improved as a result of modification and tighter management of this programme.

This was demonstrated by the recent extensive trials which culminated in the successful Tigerfish firing at the decommissioned frigate Lowestoft.

Since the original development programme began in the 1950s, the budget has necessarily been adjusted on a number of occasions to take account of successive engineering improvements. The programme is presently contained within approved budgetary levels.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Pensions (Payment)

59. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will arrange to transfer the responsibility for the payment of pensions to retired members of the Overseas Civil Service from the Overseas Development Administration to the body responsible for the payment of other service pensions.

Mr. Raison: No.

Crown Agents

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the future of the Crown Agents.

Mr. Raison: It remains the Government's intention that the Crown Agents should continue to move towards privatisation.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place a copy of the supplementary report concerning the future of the Crown Agents in the Library.

Mr. Raison: I know of no such report.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight (Trial Costs)

Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if taxation of bills of costs in the recent trial of Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight has yet taken place; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 9 May 1986 at column 254. No taxation or determination of costs in the trial of Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight has yet taken place. All defence bills must be in the hands of the court before the assessment may take place. To date only one defence bill has been received.

Legal Services (Royal Commissions)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Attorney-General how many of the recommendations of the last Royal Commissions on Legal Services in England and Scotland, respectively, have been implemented.

The Solicitor-General: I refer the hon. Member to the White Paper "The Government Response to the Report of the Royal Commission on Legal Services" (Cmnd. 9077) published in November 1983. This set out how matters then stood on the recommendations for which the Government are responsible. Of the matters still under consideration the following recommendations have since been implemented in whole or part: recommendations 9.3 (duty solicitor schemes), 9.11 (legal representation in prison disciplinary proceedings), 33.17 (consultations on appointments), 37.3, 37.5-37.8, 37.16, 37.23 (simplification of civil taxation).

The Administration of Justice Act 1985 provides for the enactment of recommendations 16.4(a) (reimbursement of costs thrown away by the death or incapacity of a judge), 21.3 and 21.4 (restrictions on conveyancing for reward), 25.3 (legal aid complaints tribunal).

The recommendations made in the report of the Royal Commission on legal services in Scotland are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Attachment Orders (Leicester)

Sir John Farr asked the Attorney-General if he will take steps to improve the services provided in the processing and issuing of attachment of earnings orders at Leicester court and to eliminate present delays; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: I understand that except for a brief period in May of this year, the Leicester county court has been able to process and issue applications for attachment of earnings orders generally within one day, but at most seven days of receipt. The time taken from issue of application to the making of an order is normally eight weeks and steps are being taken to reduce this figure to six weeks. Under rules of court, the earliest hearing date could not be before four weeks from issue of the application. If my hon. Friend has any particular cases in mind he may wish to write to the Lord Chancellor giving details.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Attorney-General how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

The Solicitor-General: I submitted written evidence to the Select Committee on Procedure in Session 1984-85. No other Minister or official from this Department has given evidence to Commons Select Committees in the Sessions 1983-84 or 1984-85.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, further to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, columns 433-4, he will publish in the Official Report particulars showing how much of the expenditure in each case was based on capital expenditure and how much on current expenditure, as defined in United Nations statistics.

Mr. Dunn: As stated in my revised reply of 12 June at column 278, only the figures for the United States of America included capital expenditure. Separate figures for capital and current expenditure for the United States of America have not been published by UNESCO since 1979. Officials are attempting to obtain more information for the United States.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the number of persons employed (a) full-time and (b) part-time in higher education, and further education, both (i) in teaching and (ii) in ancillary posts, for each of the years 1979, 1983 and 1986.

Mr. Walden: Information on the numbers of non-teaching staff in public sector higher and further education is not available centrally. The latest date for which complete information for universities is available is 1984. All figures are for England except the column showing non-teaching staff in universities, which has a wider geographical coverage.

Teachers of the Deaf

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations his Department has received from the National Deaf Children's Society concerning the training of teachers of the deaf; what reply he is sending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The director of the society has written a letter welcoming the general principle of post-experience training for the deaf and emphasising the need for sufficient in-service training to assure the supply of such teachers. My reply says that it is the Government's intention that appropriate in-service provision should be available when existing specialist initial training courses are phased out. It is intended that their last intakes will be in 1987. The costs to local authorities of such in-service training should be eligible for support under the new financial arrangements for in-service training which we intend to introduce on 1 April 1987 and for which we are seeking statutory powers through the Education Bill now before the House.

Secondary Schools

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has given any guidance to education authorities about the inclusion or exclusion of grammar schools from secondary reorganisation proposals; what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on grammar schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Guidance to local education authorities on secondary reorganisation proposals designed to meet falling rolls was issued in DES circular 4/82. It is for local education authorities to take a view on the form and pattern of secondary education best suited to local circumstances and the preferences of parents.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has given any advice to education authorities on the significance which they should give to the views of local industry and commerce when promoting any schemes for secondary reorganisation.

Mr. Dunn: No specific advice has been issued on this matter, but local education authorities are encouraged to consult widely before making statutory proposals for secondary reorganisation. It is open to local employers to make their views known either at the consultation stage or subsequently, as Government electors, when statutory notices are published under the provisions of sections 12 to 16 of the Education Act 1980.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department has collected statistics on the relative success of pupils in secondary schools in different areas of the country in obtaining O and A-level examination passes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Statistics of the examination achievements of school leavers are collected annually. Results for 1983-84 have been published in statistical bulletin 4/86.

A study comparing examination achievements in different local education authorities was published in statistical bulletin 13/84, which considered examination achievements in the context of measures of social background and of schooling.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he proposes to establish a National Council for Vocational Qualifications.

Mr. Walden: The Government hope very shortly to announce their response to the recommendations of the review group on vocational qualifications, including the recommendations that a National Council for Vocational Qualifications be established. I cannot anticipate the details of that response, but I can say that the Government have welcomed the thoughtfulness and hard work of the review group and will be considering all its recommendations with great care.

University of London

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State of Education and Science if he will publish a table showing for each university and each institution within the University of London, how many of its departments have had their research rated by the University Grants Committee outstanding, above average, average and below average.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: This information is available in the Library in the institutional annexes to the University Grants Committee's letter to universities of 20 May.

Sixth Form Colleges

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State of Education and Science how many local education authorities in England have established sixth form colleges during the last five years, and how many had been established before that; and what proportion of sixth form students of each of the local education authorities receive their education at such colleges.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986, c. 276]: There were 106 maintained secondary schools in January 1985 in local education authorities in England which were classified as sixth form colleges in the Department's annual census of schools compared with 96 schools five years later.

Over this period, 17 new sixth form colleges were established, according to the census, six were reclassified as tertiary colleges and one closed. The table lists the local authorities which had sixth form colleges recorded in the January 1985 census and gives the proportion of pupils aged 16 to 19 years in maintained schools in the local authorities who attended these colleges.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the negotiations between his Department and representatives of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry for a renewal of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme are now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: The negotiations are complete, and the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry is now consulting its members on the outcome.

A renewal of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme is proposed for a period of six years from 1 October 1986 with a provision for review after three years.

I have placed copies of the detailed proposals in the Library. They retain the essential characteristics of the scheme which was introduced in its present form in 1978 and which successive Governments have used to ensure that National Health Service pharmaceutical prices are reasonable and that the United Kingdom offers a fair return for pharmaceutical innovation and investment.

The detailed changes proposed include a more objective method, to be used from 1988-89, for keeping allowable rates of return on capital in line with changes in the average profitability of United Kingdom industry generally, and interim increases in the rates of return between renewal of the scheme and 1988-89 to reflect the rising trend in general industrial profitability. There would be a renewed and more explicit commitment on the industry's part to containment of the growth in pharmaceutical supply costs, and a more explicit basis for determining the research and development allowance in National Health Service prices which, in recognition of the costs and benefits of pharmaceutical innovation, the Government intend generally to maintain at not less than its present substantial level. There are also renewed and more explicit arrangements for consultation between the Government and the industry on trends in the costs of National Health Service medicines, and on any general developments in National Health Service pharmaceutical services. Sales promotion allowances met through National Health Service prices would remain constrained as at present to no more than 9 per cent. of the industry's total National Health Service sales revenue, though in tightly defined cases of major pharmaceutical innovation companies would for a limited period be free to spend limited additional resources of their own on product familiarisation.

Pending the outcome of the association's consultation with its members, the present scheme remains in force.

Local Office Staffs

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what has been the establishment staff number for his Department's offices in Walthamstow, Brighton and Leicester, respectively, in each year since 1979; what has been the average number of vacancies per year; and how many days have been lost each year for illness and sick leave;

(2) how many staff have been employed in his Department's offices in Walthamstow, Leicester and Brighton, respectively, in each year since 1979; and what has been the average caseload for each member of staff.

Mr. Major: Information on average case loads is not available and some other information is not available in the precise form requested. Information that is available for each office is as follows:

Legionella

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence is available to his Department about any correlation between the incidence of Legionella and the use of water fittings which do not comply with British safety standards.

Mr. Whitney: Legionella pneumophila is an organism commonly found in water. Although there is some laboratory evidence that certain materials used in fittings —for example, washers—may support microbial growth, no outbreak of infection has been directly attributable to water fittings.

Cancer (West Cumbria)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress in implementing recommendations numbered 5 to 7 of the report of the advisory group, chaired by Sir Douglas Black, on the incidence of cancer in West Cumbria.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) on 16 May at columns 587-88.

National Childbirth Trust

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the National Childbirth Trust to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that, under the procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 23 June to Friday 27 June 1986.

Social Security Reform

Mr. Maples asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he may expect to receive a reply to his letter of 22 April to the Secretary of State concerning proposed reforms to the social security system.

Mr. Major: I replied to my hon. Friend yesterday.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what were the number of fraudulent benefit claims in Leeds in the years 1979 to 1985; and what was the average amount of money involved in each claim;

(2) if he will state the number of fraudulent benefit claims as a proportion of total numbers of benefit claims, in the years 1979 to 1985;

(3) if he will publish the average amount involved in (a) fraudulent benefit claims in the years 1979 to 1985 and (b) recovered from fraudulent claimants; and what is the average period of time over which repayments are made.

Mr. Major: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of his Department's staff based in Leeds; and what proportion of these are assigned to investigating fraudulent benefit claims.

Mr. Major: On 1 June 1986 875·5 staff were employed at the six Leeds offices. The number of posts allocated to fraud work in these offices at that date was 27. The proportion of posts allocated to the investigation of fraudulent benefit claims as a percentage of total staff employed is just over 3 per cent.

In addition, the specialist claims control teams based in the north-east region of the Department's local office network will on occasion be involved in the investigation of fraudulent benefit claims in Leeds. These staff are not included in local office complements.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state how many fraudulent benefit claims resulted in prosecution in 1985; and what was the number of prosecutions as a proportion of the total number of cases discovered.

Mr. Major: Six thousand, six hundred and seventy-six claimants were prosecuted by this Department for social security benefit fraud during 1985-86; this represents approximately 7 per cent. of those cases considered for legal proceedings.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of staff employed by his Department to investigate fraudulent benefit claims, in the years 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Major: I regret the information requested is not available for 1979. The following table sets out the number of staff allocated by the Department's complementing system to fraud work for the years 1980 to 1986, and also includes specialist claims control staff not included in local office complements.

	Number
1980-81	2,044
1981-82	1,945
1982-83	2,284
1983-84	2,216
1984-85	2,488
1985-86	2,804
1986-87	*3,673

* Proposed

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the estimated cost of fraudulent benefit claims in the years 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Major: No reliable estimate is available of the cost of social security benefit fraud.

District Health Authorities (Rates)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has plans to ensure that those district health authorities facing a proportionately higher rates bill than the percentage increase in resources can meet their obligations without transferring funds from other cost centres.

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities are expected to meet pay and price increases and develop services from within the total resources allocated to them by the Government and their cost improvement programmes.

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total amount paid in lieu of rates for hospital and health centre buildings by the Blackburn, Hyndburn and Ribble Valley district health authority for each of the past three years; and what was the percentage change over the period.

Mr. Hayhoe: The annual accounts of the health authority show expenditure on rates as follows:

1982-83	391,338
1983-84	418,700
1984-85	489,615

The figures reflect an increase of 25·1 per cent. (15 per cent. in real terms) over the period.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the nurses' pay award will be met by extra specific funds from his Department in (a) Leeds Western Health Authority, (b) the Yorkshire region and (c) England as a whole.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government have increased cash limits for the hospital and community health services in England by £50 million, following the pay awards for review body staff. Of this increase, £3·575 million has been allocated to the Yorkshire regional health authority. The allocation of this sum amongst district health authorities is a matter for the region.

The Government's assessment is that this increase to their initial cash limits, together with the benefits of falling general inflation, will enable health authorities to meet the costs of the pay awards for all review body staff without adversely affecting patient services. The increased funding has not been apportioned between individual staff groups.

Junior Hospital Doctors

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the recruitment level of junior hospital doctors; how many have been recruited from EEC countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The latest available figures for numbers of junior hospital doctors are set out in the following table. Although overall the numbers in post have been increasing, I am aware of recent reports of recruitment difficulties in particular specialties and locations and I am considering the position. With regard to doctors from European Community countries, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 12 May at column 387.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were in receipt of supplementary benefit in (a) Cleveland and (b) Langbaurgh parliamentary constituency for each year since 1979.

Mr. Major: The county of Cleveland is covered by five of the Department's local offices — Eston, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Redcar and Stockton. The boundaries of these offices are conterminous with the boundary of Cleveland. Two of these offices, Eston and Redcar, deal with the parliamentary constituency of Langbaurgh and the boundaries are conterminous.

Figures of people receiving supplementary benefit from the five offices covering the county of Cleveland in May 1986, and at comparable dates for the previous seven years, are as follows:

1979	39,637
1980	41,690

THE ARTS

Visiting Arts

Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will make a statement on the level of funding for Visiting Arts.

Mr. Luce: I am pleased to report a substantial increase in the direct funding of the Visiting Arts organisation in the present financial year. The overall budget of the Visiting Arts organisation in 1986-87 will be trebled compared with 1985-86 to enable it to develop the already valuable work that it performs in facilitating visits by overseas artists and performers. The contributions will include an Arts Council grant of £210,000, in partial replacement of previous direct GLC funding; an additional contribution of £50,000, to be increased by £25,000 if further matching funding is obtained, by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs; and a contribution from me of £50,000.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Colliery Waste

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many collieries currently deposit waste in sea areas surrounding the United Kingdom; what was the total tonnage deposited in the latest year for which figures are available; and what materials were involved.

Mr. Gummer: Three collieries in the United Kingdom are licensed under the provisions of part II of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to dispose of waste at approved sites off the coast. The last full year of production, before the coal strike, was 1983 when 1,770,000 tonnes of minestone was deposited.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the number of fishing vessels decommissioned, the total cost in grants, the number of new vessels and the total cost in grants in England and Scotland in each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Gummer: The following are details on vessels and grants in England and Scotland for which information is available:

Animal Welfare

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his Department's principal achievements in the field of animal welfare since May 1979.

Mrs. Fenner: We have set up the Farm Animal Welfare Council, which has carried out wide-ranging studies and made recommendations to improve the welfare of animals on the farm, at markets and at slaughter. Its current studies include the transport of animals. We have sponsored the Animal Health and Welfare Act 1984 and made regulations to protect the welfare of poultry at the point of slaughter, have made regulations to stop unnecessary mutilations on the farm, and have introduced new welfare codes for cattle and pigs. We have also commissioned research into various aspects of poultry slaughter. Within the European Community we have secured the adoption of a directive to tighten enforcement of the rules governing welfare in transit and made implementing legislation and we have supported the setting of minimum welfare standards for battery hens. We have also played an active part in the formulation of welfare measures on hens and pigs within the Council of Europe. Work is well advanced on further codes and regulations on welfare at the point of slaughter.

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his policy objectives in the field of animal welfare.

Mrs. Fenner: Our objective is to ensure that farm animals are kept, transported, marketed, exported and slaughtered under satisfactory welfare conditions.

Cheese

Mr. Shersby asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to encourage small English cheese producers to produce camembert, brie and other soft cheeses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I welcome the innovative efforts of the dairy industry to develop new products and thus expand the market for milk. The way forward for a strong and healthy dairy industry involves thorough market research and promotion and products marketed at a consistently high quality and at a competitive price. It is for the industry itself to consider and decide how this should best be achieved.

Animal Feed Processing Units

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he expects animal feed processing units now classified as farm units to be exempt from payment of the cereal co-responsibility levy.

Mr. Gummer: The Commission rules for implementing the cereals coresponsibility levy have not yet been published in the Official Journal of the European Communities. I currently expect levy to be payable on cereals processed and then put on the market by any animal feed processing unit.

Cereals (Co-responsibility Levy)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce the system of collection to be used for the co-responsibility levy on cereals.

Mr. Gummer: The cereals coresponsibility levy applies from 1 July to this season's Community grain which undergoes first processing, is exported or is sold into intervention. The system of collection will be outlined in Commission rules which have not yet been published in the Official Journal of the European Communities. I expect these to be supplemented by a statutory instrument which will be laid before the House as soon as possible.

Rice

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the volume of EC exports of rice in each of the years 1980 to 1985, inclusive; and what was the cost to the EC budget of export restitutions for rice in each of those years.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested is as follows:

SCOTLAND

Job Creation, Renfrew

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he proposes to take to promote employment in Renfrew district in the light of the 95 redundancies announced by Armitage Shanks of Barrhead.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Government's full range of employment measures continues to be available to unemployed people in Renfrew district. These comprise the following:

Community Industry;
Community Programme;
Job Release Scheme;
Job Splitting Scheme;
Enterprise Allowance Scheme;
Voluntary Projects Programme;
Geographical Mobility Schemes;
Services for Seriously Disabled.

The Government's overall economic policies are designed to produce the right environment for enterprise to flourish and thereby to create employment opportunities in the longer term.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Rifkind: In 1983-84 one Minister and 12 officials from my Department gave evidence to Select Committees of the House including the Public Accounts Committee; the figures for 1984-85 were three Ministers and 19 officials. A number of Ministers and officials gave evidence on more than one occasion.

Power Generation

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the total capacity of the generating stations of the two Scottish electricty boards, including oil-fired capacity, when Torness becomes fully operational.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am advised by the Scottish electricity boards that their maximum available sent-out capacity in 1989-90, taking Torness at its full output capacity, will be 9,788 MW. This includes 1,284 MW of oil-fired capacity which is available for immediate operational use but excludes 1,926 MW of oil-fired capacity held in reserve which is not so available, and also excludes generating plant on the Scottish islands.

Hunterston (Fire)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to (a) the extent of the fire at Hunterston on Monday 16 June, (b) the damage which resulted, (c) the implications for the operation of the reactor and (d) the radioactive discharge or contamination which occurred; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am advised by the SSEB that a bearing in the number 8 turbine at Hunterston B nuclear power station caught fire at 11.41 am on Monday 16 June and the fire was extinguished at 11.52 am. Damage was limited to the turbine bearing and cabling in the immediate vicinity. The reactor was shut down immediately. There are no implications for radioactive discharge or contamination. The board expects that the unit will be operational again within a few days.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of patients on waiting lists for (a) urgent treatment and (b) non-urgent treatment on a health board basis for 1979 and each subsequent year.

Mr. John MacKay: Information distinguishing urgent and non-urgent cases is not held centrally. The numbers on waiting lists at 30 September in the years in question were as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	*1985

* 1985 data are provisional.

The increase in waiting lists caused by industrial action in 1982 is now being steadily reduced over Scotland as a whole. Lists tend to overstate numbers of patients waiting for treatment since they include duplicated entries and patients who no longer need treatment. Lists exclude altogether the significant numbers of patients who are admitted directly into hospitals without being at any stage included in waiting lists, that is, emergency cases.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report, the average waiting time for (a) urgent treatment and (b) non-urgent treatment for each health authority for 1979 and each subsequent year.

Mr. John MacKay: Information distinguishing urgent and non-urgent cases is not held centrally. The mean waiting times (in days) for all in-patient treatment up to 1984 (the latest year for which statistics are available) were as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Argyll and Clyde	89	98	93	77	103	95

Western Isles	45	49	46	48	57	43
Scotland	79	75	73	67	98	85

The general increase in 1983 reflects the effect of industrial action in 1982.

Semi-natural Woodlands

Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is in a position to make a statement of the Government's consideration of whether, within the existing rules, ancient semi-natural woodlands should be able to qualify for exemption from capital taxation in recognition of their heritage value.

Mr. Rifkind: The policy statement on broadleaved woodlands made on Wednesday 21 July 1985 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) at columns 557-61 indicated that the Government would be giving consideration to this matter. The conclusion which has been reached is that ancient semi-natural woodlands which are, or could be, properly included on the Nature Conservancy Council's "Inventory of Ancient Woodland" are eligible for consideration for exemption under the existing rules. In order to bring this matter to the attention of woodland owners, it has been decided to include a specific reference to the position in the next revision of the Treasury memorandum "Capital Taxation and the National Heritage", the official guide on tax reliefs for heritage property. This passage will read as follows:

"Ancient semi-natural woodlands which are, or could be, properly included on the Nature Conservancy Council's Inventory of Ancient Woodland will be eligible for consideration for exemption on scientific as well as scenic or historic grounds, but each case will need to be considered on its merits. Other woodlands on ancient woodland sites, including plantations, would not normally be expected to qualify on scientific grounds, but may be accepted if they satisfy the criteria relating to land of outstanding scenic or historic interest."

In our broadleaves policy statement of Wednesday 24 July 1985, we said that steps would be taken, in particular, to ensure that the special interest of the ancient semi-natural woodlands is recognised and maintained. I hope that the amplification of the capital taxation provisions that I have given above will provide a positive lead to owners of such woodlands and other woodlands of outstanding interest.

Labour Statistics (Stirling)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, further to his answer of 16 June, Official Report, he will publish the information on the structure of employment in the Queensland division of the Stirling constituency which was available to him when he decided not to include that area within the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

Asbestos-related Diseases

Mr. Parry asked the Paymaster General how many persons have died from asbestos-related diseases in England and Wales in each of the last five years.

Mr. Trippier: The following table gives the numbers of death certificates which mention the asbestos-related diseases asbestosis and mesothelioma. Some deaths involving mesothelioma may not be related to asbestos. The most recent figures are for 1984.

Death certificates mentioning asbestos-related diseases

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
England and Wales
Asbestosis without mesothelioma	90	119	119	108	115
Asbestosis with mesothelioma	67	62	76	86	78
Mesothelioma without asbestosis	338	352	368	426	468
Total	495	533	563	620	661

In addition, studies have shown that workers heavily exposed to asbestos in the past now suffer a significantly higher incidence of lung cancer than the general population. There are, however, no figures of the total numbers of asbestos-related deaths from this disease.

Job Creation (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General if he will specify job-creating schemes planned for the Portsmouth area in the next year.

Mr. Lang: The full range of employment, enterprise and training opportunities described in the "Action for Jobs" booklet is available to people living in Portsmouth. The only exception is the new career development loans initiative which we are piloting in four areas. I am pleased to say that a jobclub will be opening in Portsmouth in the early autumn.

Clean-up Campaign

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General when the proposed clean-up campaign will be started.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment will shortly announce the start of a new initiative aimed at increasing the quantity and quality of environmental improvement work carried out by voluntary agencies and by workers within the community programme.

Unemployed Persons (Newspaper)

Mr. Hancock asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to publish a newspaper for unemployed people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I have no plans to publish a newspaper for unemployed people. My Department and the MSC do, however, produce a wide range of publicity material covering the services available to both employed and unemployed people, including Executive Post, a newspaper distributed without charge to those registered with professional and executive recruitment.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many people were unemployed for more than one year in (a) Cleveland and (b) Langbaurgh parliamentary constituency for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. The table gives figures for 10 April 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available and for April 1984 and April 1985. The comparison is affected by the change in timing of compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for metropolitan areas and Parliamentary constituencies are derived from the new ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

Claimants unemployed over one year

	Cleveland metropolitan area	Langbaurgh parliamentary constituency
April 1984	25,135	3,643
April 1985	27,991	3,979
April 1986	27,295	3,954

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General (1) what information he has as to how many people were employed in the chemical and associated industries in Cleveland for each year since 1979;

(2) how many people were employed in manufacturing industry in Cleveland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The available information is from censuses of employment taken in 1978 and 1981 and is as follows:

Cleveland: Employees in employment in manufacturing industries and in chemical and allied industries

Standard Industrial Classification 1968	June 1978	September 1981
Manufacturing industries (Orders III to XIX)	93,700	73,700
Chemical and allied industries (Order V)	26,500	21,000

More up-to-date employment figures for counties will become available following publication of the 1984 census of employment later this year. Between censuses, employment estimates are based on small scale sample inquiries which cannot produce reliable results for areas smaller than regions.

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many people were registered as unemployed in (a) Cleveland and (b) Langbaurgh parliamentary constituency for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. The numbers of unemployed claimants in the Cleveland metropolitan area and the Langbaurgh parliamentary constituency for May of each year from 1984 to 1986 are as follows:

	Cleveland	Langbaurgh constituency
May 1984	54,933	8,275
May 1985	56,191	8,327
May 1986	53,205	7,917

The comparison is affected by the change in the timing of compilation of unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for metropolitan areas and parliamentary constituencies are derived from the new award-based system and are available only from June 1983.

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General what is his estimate of the number of unemployed construction workers in Cleveland.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available.

Data on the previous occupations of the unemployed are derived from the labour force survey, and cannot be provided for areas smaller than regions because of the sampling error that would be involved.

Tourism

Mr. Ottaway asked the Paymaster General if the review of the section 4 financial assistance scheme for tourism in England has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Department has recently completed its review of the scheme of financial assistance run by the English tourist board under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969. The Government announced in the tourism review statement on 22 November 1983 at columns 167-80 that we planned to maintain grants for section 4 expenditure in England at about the current level over the four years to 1986-87 giving a total of some £35 million for the period. It was agreed to review the scheme towards the end of that period.

The Government have now decided to continue the section 4 scheme in England. In reaching this decision, account has been taken of a study carried out by Department of Employment economists which indicates that the scheme has a valuable role in the creation of jobs at regional and local level. The English tourist board has therefore been requested to develop detailed proposals for the launch later this year of a revised section 4 scheme. This will reflect the findings of the Department's study and of the ETB's own assessment of work carried out by its consultants.

Decisions on the future level of funding for the scheme will be announced in the autumn after the current year's public expenditure round has been completed.

The scheme will also continue to be operated in Scotland and Wales.

New Businesses (Survival Rates)

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General what information he has about the survival rate of new start worker co-operatives in Britain; and what comparable information he has about the survival rate of traditional forms of small business new starts.

Mr. Trippier: No information is available on new start worker co-operatives but the co-operative Development Agency estimates that in any one year 90 per cent. of the total stock of worker co-operatives will survive. Information about the lifespan of small businesses more generally was published in "British Business" on 12 August 1983 and 7 October 1983. Copies of these articles were placed in the Library.

Co-operatives

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to how many people are currently employed in worker co-operatives in Britain.

Mr. Trippier: It is estimated that there are around 12,000 people currently employed in worker co-operatives in the United Kingdom. An estimate for Great Britain alone is not available.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to how many jobs have been created in worker co-operatives in Britain since 1976.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that there are not sufficient data available on worker co-operatives to make an assessment of job creation over the period in question. However, in 1980 there were 305 worker co-operatives employing 5,342 people compared to around 1,400 co-operatives employing about 12,000 people currently.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the average annual rate of growth of employment in firms registered under the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976 during the period November 1976 to 31 March 1986.

Mr. Trippier: The certification of co-operative and common ownership enterprises under the Industrial Common Ownership Act 1976 ceased on 2 November 1981 when the financial provisions of the Act expired. Certification was for the purpose of identifying potential recipients of loans under the Act. No information is available on the growth of employment in those enterprises certified under the Act between 1976 and 1981.

ENERGY

Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Energy when it is intended to appoint the two independent directors to the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive.

Mr. Goodlad: The appontments will be made as soon as selection procedures have been completed. I cannot, at this moment, say exactly when that will be.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people and how many children under five and under 18 years, respectively, live within five, 10, 25, and 50 milies, respectively of power generating nuclear reactors.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to his reply] 23 May 1986, c. 354]: Information is not available in the form requested. The following table sets out estimates, which were derived from data held by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, relating to the 19 principal civil nuclear establishments of the Central Electricity Generating Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Generating Board, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and British Nuclear Fuels plc, some of which do not have operating power reactors.

Distance from nuclear facilities

Ages	up to 5 miles	up to 10 miles	up to 25 miles	up to 50 miles
Under 5	45,000	175,000	900,000	2,500,000
Under 20	200,000	800,000	4,000,000	11,000,000
All	700,000	3,000,000	14,000,000	40,000,000

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Greece

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Greek Government on the current requirement for British travellers to Greece to complete landing forms, in the light of that country's membership of the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: Under the transitional arrangements in their accession Treaty, the Greek authorities are not required to apply the full provisions of the treaty of Rome on free movement of persons until the end of 1987. Until then they are entitled to require landing cards for travellers other than the self-employed who already have full treaty rights during the transitional period. For this reason I do not propose to make general representationss at present though I would consider sympathetically any evidence of inconvenience to British travellers which may have come to my hon. Friend's attention.

International Strategic Alliances

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report those international strategic alliances to which the United Kingdom is currently a signatory; and if he will indicate in each case the date on which the United Kingdom first became a signatory.

Mr. Renton: There are two international strategic alliances to which the United Kingdom is currently signatory: the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, of which the United Kingdom became a member upon signature of the North Atlantic Charter on 4 April 1949; and the Western European Union of which the United Kingdom became a member upon its creation on 6 May 1955. The Union replaced the Brussels treaty organisation, of which the United Kingdom had become a member upon signature of the Brussels treaty on 17 March 1948.

Mr. Raoul Wallenburg

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concerning the case of Mr. Raoul Wallenburg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Campbell).

Cyprus

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with Greek Cypriot leaders about the Cyprus peace plan put forward by the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Renton: When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend met President Kyprianou on 7 April the UN initiative was discussed. We have subsequently remained in close contact with the Government of the Republic of Cyprus through diplomatic channels.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the renewal of the mandate of the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus.

Mr. Renton: The UNFICYP mandate was unanimously renewed for a further six months on 14 June as Security Council resolution 585. We joined the other troop contributors in issuing a statement drawing attention to the financial burden imposed by UNFICYP and expressing concern that other UN members should not take for granted the force's existence.

Republic of Ireland (Prime Minister)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland last requested a meeting with the United Kingdom ambassador; what was the subject of the representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No such request has been received recently.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Small Businesses

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those measures introduced by his Department within the past year and intended to be of benefit to small businesses.

Dr. Boyson: In the past year the Local Enterprises Development Unit (LEDU), Northern Ireland's small firms agency, has introduced a market development grant scheme to help small firms adopt a better approach to marketing and a property development grant to encourage private developers to provide accommodation suitable for small companies. LEDU has also substantially revised its enterprise grant scheme for business start-ups, increasing the grant levels and adding a second tier of grant to stimulate very small firms to expand their work force. In April 1986 I announced an additional allocation of resources to this scheme, which will enable it to cater for a further 200 businesses in the current year.

In addition, LEDU has extended its interest relief grant scheme to include interest charged to companies for factoring services and has significantly increased the grant limits under the better business services and innovation support services schemes, which help small firms to obtain professional expertise on business problems and the introduction of new technology.

Outside LEDU's sphere, I have announced an expansion of the Northern Ireland enterprise allowance scheme to 2,200 places by April 1987 and a reduction in the qualifying period of unemployment for the scheme from 13 to eight weeks.

A product development workshop has been established at Springtown training centre in Londonderry. The workshop's aim is to provide facilities to entrepreneurs wishing to develop new ideas or to manufacture prototypes.

Small firms in Northern Ireland may also benefit from the introduction or improvement of schemes administered on a national basis, such as the small firms loan guarantee scheme.

A major element in the Government's effort to help small firms is the policy of deregulation which, as the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers" indicates, is being pursued as a parallel exercise in Northern Ireland.

Electricity Service (Site Sale)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Northern Ireland Electricity Service sold its 1·3 acre site at the rear of Chesterbrook crescent, Newtownards, Co. Down, by private treaty or by public advertisement; whether any requests to purchase parts of this site had been received by the Northern Ireland Electricity Service from adjoining householders; if adjoining householders were advised that the site was for sale; and if he will make a statement on the procedures implemented by the Northern Ireland Electricity Service in respect of the sale of this site.

Dr. Boyson: The Northern Ireland Electricity Service sold the site in question by private treaty following public advertisement.

In 1983, various people, including a public representative acting on behalf of local residents, expressed an interest in buying the land. At that time all inquirers were told that the land would not be placed on the market until after the completion of a road widening scheme.

The land was eventually offered for sale in October 1985 and, at that time, advertisements were placed in all editions of two local newspapers. A large hoarding was also erected on the land. Adjoining householders were not separately advised of the intended sale and, in the event, no offers were received from them. In undertaking the sale of this site, the Northern Ireland Electricity Service followed its normal practice, which is to sell to the highest bidder by means of private treaty following notice of its intention to sell.

20 Main Street, Milliste, Co. Down

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the planning authority consulted the traffic branch of the Royal Ulster Constabulary prior to its decision to issue final planning permission for the change of use of premises at 20 Main street, Milliste, Co. Down; whether he is satisfied that larger oil tankers emerging from this location into Main street do not constitute a traffic hazard; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The roads service of the Department of the Environment was consulted on this matter prior to the issue of planning permission and its advice was that there were no traffic reasons which would have justified a refusal of permission. On this basis it was not considered necessary to consult the traffic branch of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The site was formerly used as a petrol filling station to which deliveries were made by large oil tankers and it is not anticipated that the proposed new use of the site will lead to a traffic hazard.

Job Creation

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of jobs promoted by the Industrial Development Board and its predecessor, the Department of Commerce, for (a) indigenous firms and (b) overseas firms in Northern Ireland since 1978-79; how many of these jobs are the result of (i) new enterprise or (ii) expansion; and what is the average cost per job.

Dr. Boyson: The following table contains the information requested:

Jobs Promoted

Year	Indigenous Firms		Overseas Firms		Total
	New	Expansions	New	Expansions
1978-79	357	1,204	4,165	1,364	7,090
1979-80	308	1,793	3,100	2,333	7,534
1980-81	430	769	178	1,928	3,305
1981-82	131	381	348	815	1,675
1982-83	265	1,063	159	2,304	3,791
1983-84	715	1,191	539	1,111	3,556
1984-85	394	1,478	548	2,847	5,267
1985-86	204	1,224	224	1,258	2,910
TOTAL	2,804	9,103	9,261	13,960	35,128

The average cost per job for all indigenous and overseas jobs assisted during 1985-86 was £5,262 and £8,776 respectively. A breakdown of the cost per job between new and expansion cases could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many jobs have been promoted since 1978-79 by the Industrial Development Board or its predecessor the Department of Commerce in the following industrial groups: (a) engineering, (b) textiles, clothing and leather, (c) food, drink, and tobacco and (d) all other industries; and what was the average cost of each job.

Dr. Boyson: The number of new jobs promoted since 1978-79, by industrial group, is set out in the following table:

	Engineering	Textiles Clothing and Leather	Food, Drink and Tobcacco	All Other Industries	Total
1978-79	4,634	1,282	144	1,030	7,090
1979-80	4,802	1,786	325	621	7,534
1980-81	1,494	1,092	264	455	3,305
1981-82	667	450	89	469	1,675

Information on the average cost of each job promoted could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the average cost per job for all jobs to which selective assistance was related during 1985-86 was £7,063.

Conversion Grants

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which private sector organisations in Northern Ireland received capital cost conversion grants in 1985 and 1986 for residential premises for the elderly from (a) the Local Enterprise Development Unit (LEDU) and (b) the Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland); what amounts were paid to each organisation in each case; and on what basis payments were made and what proportion of total conversion costs these formed in each case.

Dr. Boyson: Neither LEDU nor DHSS pay capital cost conversion grant in respect of residential premises for the elderly. However, LEDU has offered assistance towards the cost of adaptation of premises for nursing homes for both elderly and other patients. This assistance amounted to £193,826 in respect of eleven projects in 1985 and £134,440 in respect of three projects in 1986. For reasons of commercial confidentiality it is not our practice to give details of individual projects.

Lough Neagh

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a statement on the ecological consequences of sand and gravel extraction as currently practised in the north-west sector of Lough Neagh has been deposited with the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and National Resources, under article 3.2 of the Ramsar convention.

Mr. Needham: The practice of extracting sand and gravel from Lough Neagh pre-dates the coming into force of the Ramsar convention. There have been no significant technological changes in this extraction which would alter its overall effect and it is therefore considered inappropriate to deposit a statement under that convention.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a statement on the ecological consequences of the recent introduction of roach (Rutilus rutilus) to Lough Neagh has been deposited with the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, under article 3.2 of the Ramsar convention.

Dr. Boyson: The presence of roach in Lough Neagh pre-dates United Kingdom ratification of the Ramsar convention and their presence is not considered to result from technological developments, pollution or other human interference. It would therefore be inappropriate to take action under article 3.2 of the convention.

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance or encouragement is given by Her Majesty's Government to research into the flora and fauna of Lough Neagh.

Dr. Boyson: The Northern Ireland Departments of Agriculture and Environment conduct research on the flora and fauna of Lough Neagh. The Government have also provided some £150,000 over the past 18 years in support of work conducted by the University of Ulster.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many grammar schools there are in the various areas of Northern Ireland; what is the percentage of selection for such grammar schools: what indications he has of the success of pupils from Northern Ireland secondary schools in external O and A level examinations compared with the rest of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are 77 grammar schools in the following education and library board areas:

	Number
Belfast	18
Western	13
North-Eastern	18
South-Eastern	10
Southern	18

Of the total number of pupils tranferring to secondary education for the 1985-86 school year just over 28 per cent. transferred to grammar schools. Success rates in GCE examinations for Northern Ireland entrants and those in England and Wales can only be compared on the basis of all entrants, including students from further education colleges and those entering privately. The information based on subject entries in the summer 1984 examinations is as follows:

	Northern Ireland	England	Wales
GCE O-Level
Percentage achieving grades A-C	63·0	57·2	51·3
GCE A-Level
Percentage achieving grades A-E	74·2	69·8	71·7

Dublin (Ministerial Visit)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the purpose, and what was the result, of the visit to Dublin, of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott).

Mr. Tom King: My hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), who has day-to-day responsibility for security matters, visited Dublin on 13 June to meet the Irish Minister for Justice and discuss matters of mutual interest.

Higher Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what percentage of those Northern Irish students who go on to higher education go to university;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the percentage of Northern Irish students at universities in the United Kingdom who go to universities in (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Scotland, (c) England and (d) Wales;

(3) what percentage of those Northern Irish students who go on to higher and further education go to Universities.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 17 June 1986]: The information is as follows:

80·2 per cent.

Northern Ireland—74·2 per cent.; information is not available for Scotland, England and Wales separately.

33·0 per cent.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Palace of Westminster (Tours)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Lord Privy Seal if he has any plans to change existing arrangements for the admission of the public for tours of the Palace of Westminster, in view of the number of people waiting outside without shelter for such tours; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: Arrangements for Members' parties on the line of route have been considered recently by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee. To help relieve the congestion caused by the large number of visitors arrangements have been made for the Norman Porch entrance to be opened at 9.30 am instead of 10 am and the special permit system has been extended to cover all sitting days throughout the year. If my hon. Friend has any particular points to raise I suggest that in the first instance he should write to the Serjeant at Arms.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Film Releasing (Experiment)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the Manchester and Glasgow experiment in film releasing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Manchester and Glasgow experiment in film releasing ended on 29 May. The experiment was conducted by the Office of Fair Trading at the request of my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who is responsible for corporate and consumer affairs. The Director General of Fair Trading has been asked to report on the results of the experiment as soon as possible.

Post Office

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post offices have been downgraded in Wales in each year since 1979; and how many fewer people work at those offices now than before their downgrading.

Mr. Pattie: This is a matter for the Post Office Board. However, the board has informed me that the numbers of Crown post offices in Wales downgraded to sub-post office status in each year since 1979 and the number of staff employed before downgrading and on 18 June 1986 are as follows:

	Number of Offices Downgraded	Staff Before Downgrading	As at 18 June 1986
1979	1	5	3
1980	0	—	—
1981	0	—	—
1982	1	2	4
1983	0	—	—
1984	3	9	7
1985	0	—	—
1986*	0	—	—

* to 18 June

Notes:

1. All staff at Crown Offices are Post Office employees. When the offices were downgraded, the staff were transferred to other duties within the Post Office. Sub-postmasters are not employees of the Post Office but work on an agency basis. They employ and pay assistants as required.
2. The figures for staff as at 18 June 1986 include the sub-postmaster.

Asbestos

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many BSI standards still specify the use of asbestos.

Mr. Pattie: The BSI is currently unable to quantify the number of standards specifying the use of asbestos. However, I understand that it proposes to commission an audit of British standards with a view to identifying and eliminating references to asbestos where practicable.

Patent Office

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, in setting targets for the board of management of the Patent Office, he intends to (a) apply cash limits to the office, or (b) to limit the freedom of the office to raise fees and charges.

Mr. Pattie: As announced in a written reply on 13 January the aims behind the decision to change the status of the Patent Office to that of a statutory non-departmental body included those of freeing it from the traditional civil service framework and ensuring that it should be self-supporting from fees, and free to finance investment programmes. Legislative proposals for the office including financial provisions will be laid before Parliament. The details of the future financial arrangements including the type of targets to be set are still under consideration.

British Steel Corporation (Cleveland)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people were employed by the British Steel Corporation in Cleveland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison Separate manpower figures for Cleveland are not readily available. I have asked the Corporation to provide me with the necessary information and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Steel Workers (Schemes)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what the cost has been for each of the iron and steel European re-adaption benefits scheme employment and income security agreement schemes for each year since their inception in real terms and in comparative terms using 1985 as a base year;

(2) how many redundant steel workers were retrained under the iron and steel European readaptation benefits scheme employment and income security agreement schemes in each year since their inception.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Shipbuilders (Cleveland)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people were employed by British Shipbuilders in Cleveland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is as follows:

	Number
March 1979	2,756
March 1980	2,405
March 1981	2,127
March 1982	2,118
March 1983	1,925
March 1984	1,625
March 1985	1,420
March 1986	1,478

Al Fayed Investment and Trust (UK) plc and House of Fraser plc

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he intends to take following receipt of a solicitor's letter dated 16 June together with an accompanying memorandum and other documents relating to the merger between Al Fayed Investment and Trust (UK) plc and House of Fraser plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As he is bound to do my right hon. Friend is considering carefully the representations made by Stephenson Harwood on behalf of Lonrho.

Departmental Advisory Services

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about problems caused by the high level of demand for his Department's business technical advisory services.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986, c. 373]: The assistance for manufacturing, design and quality assurance consultancy projects offered under the business and technical advisory services has proved a popular and successful element in the Department's support programme. The budget for these services has increased fourfold since 1982 and in 1986-87 is £20 million.

The widening of the eligibility criteria in 1985 to include the very smallest firms and the extension of the assistance to the service sector has led to a substantial increase in demand for the services. The Government remain determined to contain public expenditure and are not, therefore, prepared to increase the budget to satisfy in full this demand. However, I am pleased to announce that a further £2·5 million will be added for 1986-87, increasing the budget to £22·5 million. This additional funding will help ease the present problem of excess demand: it will not solve it entirely. Having taken the advice of my Department's technology transfer advisory services committee, I am therefore introducing the following additional measures to bring demand and supply into better balance and concentrate the assistance on projects likely to prove most worthwhile:

a) to qualify for assistance, consultancy projects must form part of a sound business plan. The benefits expected from the consultancy should be quantifiable, realisable quickly and lead to an increase in international competitiveness;

b) applicants will be entitled to only one consultancy project within each of the three elements of the services. No project should be of less than eight man-days' duration;

c) eligibility will be restricted to independent firms or groups with 1-500 employees;

d) the contribution from the applicant will be increased from 25 per cent. to 33⅓ per cent.

Applications for assistance already under consideration will be dealt with under the existing terms and conditions. From today new applications will be subject to the above terms and conditions.

PRIME MINISTER

International Atomic Energy Agency

19. Mr. McCrindle asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the expansion of the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency in nuclear safety investigations.

The Prime Minister: The International Atomic Energy Agency is already able to provide assistance to national authorities in assessing safety at nuclear facilities, on request, through its operational safety review teams. The draft programme of increased agency work on nuclear safety prepared by the agency's secretariat envisages an expansion of the activities of these teams. This will be further considered at the agency's general conference in September. The United Kingdom accepts the principle of this proposal.

North Yorkshire

37. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to North Yorkshire.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

F111 Aircraft

68. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister pursuant to her answer of 3 June, Official Report, column 731, to her hon. Member for Linlithgow, if she will now name the American sources from which she received the advice that F111 aircraft were more precise and less likely to cause collateral damage and civilian casualties than carrier-based aircraft in the context of the American attack on Libya; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to my statement in the House on 15 April and my speech in the debate on 16 April.

Kenilworth

77. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit Kenilworth during the course of the current year.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Hippy Convoy (Hampshire)

Q117. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister if she will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to allocate extra funds to the Hampshire county council and to the Hampshire police authority to cover additional expenditure incurred in connection with the presence in the New Forest of the hippy convoy; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The nature and scale of the additional demands arising from the presence of the convoy were not such as to justify changing the normal funding arrangements, under which more than half of policing costs are met by central funding through police grant.

Offshore Oil-related Industry

Q119. Mr. Kennedy asked the Prime Minister what is her assessment of the effect of lower oil prices on an onshore oil-related industry; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Although some short-term reduction in the volume of business available to the onshore based oil-related industry supplying goods and services to the offshore industry is likely to result from lower oil prices, the Department of Energy has approved 10 new projects so far this year which will provide substantial opportunities for the offshore supplies industry. Current expenditure on supplying, maintaining and operating existing oil and gas fields is running at over £6 million per day and a continued high level of activity is expected.

Engagements

Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 June.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I also attended a memorial meeting for the late Lord Shinwell. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Asbestos

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination and implementation of Her Majesty's Government's policy on the control of asbestos.

The Prime Minister: Yes. There is close liaison at official level between the Health and Safety Commission, the Department of the Environment and the Department of Trade and Industry's consumer safety unit.

Mr. Raoul Wallenberg

Mr. Campbell asked the Prime Minister if she will list the occasions during each of the last seven years, when she has raised the case of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg with the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; what response has been received; if she has any plans to make further representations; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The case of Raoul Wallenberg has been raised with the Soviet authorities on several occasions in recent years: by the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) with the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister in 1983, 1984 and 1985, and by the British delegation to the Ottawa human rights meeting in May 1985. We will continue to assist the Swedish Government in any way which may be appropriate in their efforts to establish with greater clarity the fate of Mr. Wallenberg.

La Belle Discotheque, Berlin (Bombing)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, Official Report, column 287, 12 June, whether she has evidence that countries other than Libya were involved in the bombing of La Belle discotheque in Berlin on 5 April.

The Prime Minister: The only firm evidence that we have is of Libyan involvement.

Minister for Information Technology (Speech)

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister whether the speech by the Minister for Information Technology the hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie) to the annual dinner of Rank Xerox on 16 June, in so far as it related to council housing, represents Government policy; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Patchett asked the Prime Minister whether the speech by the hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie) to the annual dinner of Rank Xerox on 16 June, in so far as it related to council housing, represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The principal aim of the Government's housing policy is to encourage home ownership and nearly 960,000 council homes have been sold to their tenants since we came into office. We recognise that local authority housing continues to have an important role to play, particularly in catering for those whose needs cannot be met in the private sector. We have encouraged local authorities to improve the management of their housing, with particular emphasis on the development of partnership with the private sector. We have enabled the renovation of more than half a million council houses, considerably more than under the previous Government. We have also launched the urban housing renewal unit to seek ways of improving the quality of life in rundown council estates.

WALES

Trawsfynydd (Radiation Levels)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 23 May, Official Report, column 350, on radiation levels at Trawsfynydd immediately following the Chernobyl disaster, if he will now publish the level of iodine 131 at Trawsfynydd for the days between the Chernobyl disater and 3 May; and what was the highest daily level of iodine 131 detected at Trawsfynydd during the 12-month period prior to the Chernobyl disaster; and if he will arrange for such information to be publicly available on a routine basis.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The first date for which rainwater was sampled at Trawsfynydd following the Chernobyl accident was 3 May.

Monitoring of radioactivity in rainfall does not form part of the environmental monitoring programme which nulcear power stations are required to undertake under their terms of authorisation. However, Trawsfynydd nuclear power station does analyse bulk samples of rainwater on a monthly basis, and no iodine 131 was detected in the 12-month period up to 3 May.

The Department now publishes an "Environmental Digest for Wales", which includes data on raidoactivity levels near Trawsfynydd. A copy of the digest is in the Library of the House.

Hospitals (Performance Monitoring)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what monitoring of the effectiveness of comparable hospitals in Wales is carried out.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The directorate for the NHS in Wales regularly reviews district health authority performance. These reviews include comparison between hospitals based on published data.

The data used for comparison includes the annual booklet "Key Statistical Indicators for National Health Service Management in Wales", Welsh costing returns and hospital waiting list bulletins.

Individual district health authorities also carry out their own comparisons using both published data and management information.

NHS (Private Practice)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he instructed all health authorities in Wales that subject to clinical considerations, earlier private consultation should not lead to earlier National Health Service admission or to earlier access to National Health Service procedures; and if he is satisfied that all health authorities in Wales are now acting accordingly.

Mr. Mark Robinson: This guidance was first issued to health authorities in Wales in December 1980. Authorities have since been reminded regularly of this principle, which is repeated in the consolidated advice contained in the handbook on the management of private practice in NHS hospitals issued in March this year.

School Leavers (Unemployment Benefit)

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of school leavers claiming unemployment benefit in the peak months of each of 1983, 1984 and 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Published figures for unemployed school leavers normally relate to those under the age of 18. In all three years the peak occurred in September. The figures are as follows:

	Number
1983	14,719
1984	12,028
1985	11,327

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is as follows:

Session	Ministers	Officials
1983-84	1	6
1984-85	1	19

Education Expenditure

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much local authorities in Wales spent on education in 1980-81 and in the last year for which the information is available; and how these figures compare in real terms.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Local authority net expenditure on education for the years 1980-81 and 1984-85 (the latest for which outturn expenditure information is available) was as follows:

£ million
1980-81	1984-85
541·4	689·3

Expressed in real terms using the GDP deflator the figures are as follows:

1980-81	1984-85
694·3	689·3

Health Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each Welsh health authority for each year since 1980 the number of (a) medical staff, (b) nursing staff, and (c) ancillary staff, expressing these figures in terms of actual numbers of employees and in whole-time equivalent figures; and if he will also give these figures adjusted to account for the change in the working week.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Available information relates to 30 September each year, and is given in the following table. There are no changes in the working week during the period covered by the table, and therefore no adjustments are necessary to the whole-time equivalent figures.

Gynaecological Treatment

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the women awaiting in-patient gynaecological treatment in Wales are infertility cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: This information is not available centrally.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each Welsh health authority the percentage change in expenditure since 1979 expressed in (a) cash terms, (b) deflated by the gross domestic product deflator and (c) deflated by the National Health Service deflator; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The percentage increase in total health authority expenditure between 1979-80 and 1984-85 in cash terms and deflated by the GDP deflator was as follows:

Health authority	Increase in cash terms	Increase deflated by GDP deflator percentage	percentage

South Glamorgan	72·6	12·9
West Glamorgan	80·9	18·4

Note: Actual expenditure details for 1985-86 are not yet available.
* East Dyfed and Pembrokeshire health authority were set up on 1 April 1982; consequently the expenditure for those two authorities since 1982-83 have been combined for comparison purposes.

It is inappropriate and misleading to revalue expenditure of individual health authorities by reference to the national NHS indices of pay and prices because of the composition of the individual authorities' expenditure can vary substantially from the national average.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are awaiting accommodation on Welsh council house waiting lists at the latest date for which figures are available; what special measures he is considering to solve the waiting list problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information on local authority waiting lists for housing is not held centrally.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how how much money is currently held back from use in Wales through housing capital receipts limitations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No money is currently held back from use in Wales through housing capital receipts limitations. Authorities are free to use the cash from the sale of assets as they wish, the main ways being to redeem debt or to finance expenditure directly, in lieu of borrowing.

Authorities are also able to use a prescribed proportion of the value of their accumulated receipts to increase their spending power each year. At the start of 1985-86 accumulated housing receipts are estimated to have been £218 million. About £45 million of this was available to authorities to increase their spending power in 1985-86 together with a further £13 million of receipts received during the year. Although many local authorities have not made full use of this spending power, any unused balance is available to increase spending power in future years.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been sold in Wales since first being made available for purchase.

Mr. Mark Robinson: 60,748 council dwellings have been sold since 1967; comparable information for earlier years is not readily available.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the capital expenditure on housing in Wales each year (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms from 1979-80 to 1986-87, inclusive.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Totals for gross capital expenditure on housing in Wales in the period 1979-80 to 1986-87 are given in the following table:

	Cash terms	£million real terms (1984-85 prices)
1979-80*	152·7	232·2
1980-81*	145·5	186·3

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each Welsh health authority for each year since 1980 (a) the total joint finance expenditure and (b) the total overspend or underspend for joint finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The total joint finance expenditure by each health authority, including any Welsh Office central contribution, is set out in the table. Any underspending or overspending on schemes is a matter for the management of individual health authorities, and this information is not held centrally.

Unfit Houses

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the number of houses classified by his Department as unfit, at the latest date for which such information is available; if he proposes to increase his financial allocations to housing authorities in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In the 1981 Welsh house condition survey, 90,900 houses in Wales were classed as unfit (this figure excludes second homes). The 1986 survey is currently under way. It is the most comprehensive survey ever undertaken in Wales and it is hoped that the results will be published at the end of 1987.

Housing capital allocations to Welsh local authorities for 1986-87 have been increased by nearly 30 per cent. over 1985-86.

Cardiff Harbour Mouth Barrage

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has received the consultants' report on the Cardiff harbour mouth barrage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have received the reports on the preliminary studies into the feasibility of building a barrage across the Cardiff harbour mouth and of the investment potential in the south Cardiff area. Copies of these reports have been placed in the Library of the House together with a summary of their conclusions.

The reports are encouraging and suggest that the construction of a barrage at an estimated cost of about £45 million would be technically feasible and would be likely to create significant new development opportunities in the Cardiff waterfront area and beyond. The reports recommend further confirmatory studies before any decision to proceed wih the building of a barrage is taken.

I accept these conclusions and intend to commission further work on engineering aspects, conservation, and investment potential.

I understand that this further work can be undertaken by the autumn of this year. In the meantime, I intend to consult all interested parties about the content of these reports.

DEFENCE

Community Programme

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on the latest proposals for opportunities on the community programme provided by his Department.

Mr. Lee: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

RAF Exercise (Carnoch Glen)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the purpose of the expedition mounted by seven RAF aircraft over the Carnoch Glen in Knoydart, north-west Scotland, on the afternoon of Wednesday, 28 May; what was the cost to the public purse of this expedition; whether any speed or noise limitations are placed upon aircraft taking part in such exercises; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: It has not been possible from the information provided to identify the aircraft. There were, however, no special exercises involving low-flying military aircraft in north-west Scotland during the afternoon of 28 May, and it is probable that the aircraft were engaged in routine day-to-day low-flying training, the cost of which is contained in the training budget. Routine low-flying rules restrict aircraft to no faster than 450 knots, with a minimum height of normally no lower than 250 ft.

Service Personnel (School Visit)

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are currently involved in information visits to schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: 144 service personnel are employed in presentation teams and as school and college liaison officers.

Members of the careers information offices field force staff of all three services also from time to time visit schools as part of their more general responsibilities.

Trident

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the progress of the research and development programme for the British Trident nuclear warhead; and when he expects development of that warhead to be completed.

Mr. Lee: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 11 February 1986, at column 442.

Lucas Aerospace

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will (a) list the value and nature of contracts above £1,000 in value awarded to Lucas Aerospace since June 1983 and (b) indicate which ones include work for Lucas Aerospace's Hemel Hempstead factory.

Mr. Lee: It is not the practice of the Ministry to reveal details of contracts placed with individual contractors as this information is commercial in confidence. However, the overall value of contracts placed with Lucas Aerospace in the financial years 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86 was approximately £115 million.

The distribution of work within the Lucas Aerospace organisation is a matter for that company.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Younger: The number of Ministers and officials from my Department who gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in the 1983-84 Session was three and 82 respectively. The corresponding figures for the 1984-85 Session were two and 63. In both Sessions a number of witnesses gave evidence on more than one occasion and the figures for official witnesses include members of the armed forces.

Weapons Systems

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many new weapons systems have been ordered by Her Majesty's Government since 1970; how many of these were or are more than one year, and more than three years, respectively, late in entering operational service when compared with the original target date; and what were the specific reasons in each case.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is very extensive and cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost and effort, and much of it is classified.

However, detailed information of this nature is made available to the Public Accounts and Defence Select Committees.

SP70 Howitzer

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the SP70 155 mm howitzer will enter service; how many are being ordered; and when the first orders were placed.

Mr. Freeman: On present plans SP70 should enter service in the early 1990s, although a trinational review of the development programme is currently taking place which may affect the way ahead on the programme. No production orders have yet been placed. It is not the practice to disclose details of potential orders of defence equipment.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the date of the commencement of phase A of the SP70 155 mm howitzer project.

Mr. Lee: November 1973.

LAW 80 Anti-tank System

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the contractual and management difficulties connected with the LAW 80 anti-tank system; and what lessons his Department have learned from them.

Mr. Lee: Details of the arrangements between the Ministry of Defence and its contractors and their subcontractors are matters of commercial confidence. The need to increase performance during the course of development as a result of an increased threat proved more difficult than expected.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Job Creation (Public Expenditure and Taxation)

4. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent research has been conducted by the Treasury into the respective effects on unemployment of increases in public expenditure and tax cuts.

Mr. Brooke: Lower taxes create the conditions for a sustained increase in employment by improving the rewards to effort and enterprise. Lasting jobs cannot be bought by higher public spending.

Tourism

6. Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect of the lack of American tourists on Government revenue for 1986.

Mr. Brooke: It is too soon to assess the extent of any reduction in the numbers of American tourists and the consequences for Government revenue.

Personal Equity Plans

8. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what increase in the number of individual investors in industry he anticipates as a result of the proposed personal equity plans.

Mr. Lawson: I would expect a large number of people to take advantage of this important new incentive.

33. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the Budget proposals for private equity plans.

50. Mr. Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the response has so far been to his proposal for personal equity plan.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave on 15 May 1986, at columns 840-41, to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman).

Privatisation

9. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the expected value accruing to the Exchequer from the sale of assets by (a) the National Health Service and (b) the nationalised industries during 1986-87.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The value of sales of assets in 1986-87 by the National Health Service and the nationalised industries is estimated at £130 million and £184 million, respectively.

45. Mr. O'Brien asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the sums to be raised in the next year from the future privatisation of public assets.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my predecessor gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 8 April 1986 at column 98.

Job Creation (Public Expenditure)

15. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made any recent study of the effects of public expenditure on job creation.

Mr. Brooke: The effective control of public expenditure is essential if the economy if to perform better to generate lasting jobs.

37. Mr. Barron asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made a study of the effects of public capital expenditure on employment.

Mr. MacGregor: There are considerable limitations to any estimates of the effects of public capital spending on employment. Such estimates depend on the definitions and assumptions used, as well as the time scale chosen.

Public Expenditure

18. Mr. Conway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money in public expenditure.

34. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money from public expenditure.

54. Mr. William Powell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money from public expenditure.

56. Mr. Powley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money in public expenditure.

22. Mr. Galley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money in public expenditure.

23. Dr. Twinn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has plans to increase the value for money obtained from existing levels of public expenditure.

24. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to obtain better value for money from public expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: In the annual review of public spending we are looking not just at the money spent but at what is being achieved with the money; we are using reviews and scrutinies to look in depth at particular areas; and Departments are improving their financial management. The last public expenditure White Paper listed over 1,200 output measures and performance indicators, which show the attention and priority we are giving to this critical aspect of public spending policy.

38. Mr. Portillo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has about the proportion of gross domestic product taken by public expenditure in the United States of America and Japan; and what is the comparable figure for the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: International comparisons of public expenditure should be treated with caution because of differences in the composition of expenditure and in governmental organisation. Such comparisons are available only in terms of the OECD statistic "total outlays of Government". This definition is similar to that of general Government expenditure used in the public expenditure White Paper but excludes net lending, includes debt write-offs by general Government and makes adjustment for expenditure on sick pay and unfunded pension schemes.

On this basis, the latest figures are:

*Total outlays of government as percentage of GDP

	1981	1982	1983	1984
United Kingdom	47·8	47·3	47·3	48·0
United States of America	35·2	37·7	38·1	n/a
Japan	34·1	33·6	34·3	33·1

40. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what means he uses to measure value for money obtained from public expenditure.

52. Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what means he uses to measure value for money obtained from public expenditure.

51. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the potential for increased value for money in public spending programmes.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash).

43. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to improve audit arrangements in the public sector so as to indentify more fully opportunities for increasing value for money from public expenditure programmes.

Mr. MacGregor: My Department supports and follows up the Comptroller and Auditor General's value for money examinations under the National Audit Act 1983, and the work of the Audit Commission and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in relation to local authorities and the nationalised industries respectively. In the field of internal audit, much has been done in recent years to improve its quality and ability to support management in getting better value for money. It is the purpose of the Treasury's internal audit development division to promote best practice in Government Departments and this work is continuing.

44. Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there are any plans to increase public expenditure above the levels set out in the last public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Business Expansion Scheme

19. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the amount raised by the business expansion scheme since its initiation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: £105 million was invested under the scheme in the first year, and latest figures show at least £147 million was invested in 1984-85. It is too early to say how much was invested last year, but we expect a further increase.

25. Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the money raised by the business expansion scheme went to manufacturing companies for the last date for which figures are available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Almost 28 per cent. of investment was in manufacturing in the first two years.

Value Added Tax

20. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the implementation of the legislation on value added tax penalties in the Finance Act 1985.

Mr. Brooke: The Keith committee recommendations concerning value added tax were the subject of two consultative exercises, the second involving the publication of exposure clauses. A large number of responses were received and some further representations have been made since Royal Assent last year.

TUC (Economic Activity)

21. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next intends to meet leaders of the Trades Union Congress to discuss the current level of economic activity.

Mr. Lawson: I will next meet leaders of the Trades Union Congress at the National Economic Development Council on Wednesday 9 July.

Inflation

26. Mrs. Currie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level he expects inflation to be by the end of the current year; and what were the rates of inflation at the end of 1975, 1976, 1977 and 1978, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: The latest forecast for inflation was given in the Budget statement and produced a figure of 3½ per cent. for 1986. The rates in the fourth quarters of 1975, 1976, 1977 and 1978 were 25·3 per cent., 14·9 per cent., 13·1 per cent. and 8·1 per cent., respectively.

Mr. Spencer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his latest estimate for the rate of inflation over the next 12 months.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The next published forecast for inflation is due to appear at the time of the autumn statement.

Occupational Pension Schemes

27. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the charges of under funding in occupational pension schemes.

Mr. Norman Lamont: None.

Labour Statistics

28. Mr. Eastham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were in employment in May 1979 and at the latest available date.

Mr. MacGregor: Figures for total employment are available only for the end month of each quarter. The whole economy employed labour force in Great Britain was 24,775,000 in June 1979 and 24,010,000 in December 1985.

Married Man's Allowance

29. Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning his proposals to abolish the married man's allowance.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The abolition of the married man's allowance is only one aspect of the possible change to a system of transferable allowances discussed in the Green Paper "The Reform of Personal Taxation" (Cmnd. 9756).

Most of the comments so far received on the Green Paper support transferable allowances. I hope that as many people as possible will let us have their views.

Taxation and Unemployment

30. Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has made a recent study of the connection between the level of taxation and the level of unemployment.

48. Mr. Maxton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made a recent study of the effect on unemployment of tax cuts.

Mr. MacGregor: Lower taxes create the conditions for a sustained increase in employment by improving the rewards to effort and enterprise.

Charities

31. Mr. Dickens asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will report on the latest representations from charity organisations following the initiatives presented in his last Budget.

39. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from charities regarding the revision of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer my right hon. Friend gave on 4 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) on 4 June at columns 559-60.

41. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the Budget proposal to encourage payroll giving to charities.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A number of representations have been received and the Inland Revenue will shortly be issuing a document giving details of how the scheme will work.

Pound Sterling

32. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the real value of the pound sterling at the latest available date compared with the 1979 figure.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In May 1986 the pound was worth 56 per cent. of its May 1979 value.

CBI (Public Expenditure)

35. Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on public expenditure from the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. MacGregor: Public expenditure matters are mentioned from time to time in the course of contacts between the CBI and Treasury Ministers.

Economic Growth

36. Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the expected rate of growth of the economy in 1987.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest forecast published in March in the financial statement and Budget report showed a 2¼ per cent. increase in gross domestic product in real terms over the year to the first half of 1987.

Departmental Staff

42. Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants of the rank of principal and above left his Department in each of the years 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86, respectively; for what reasons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The numbers of civil servants of the rank of principal and equivalent and above leaving the Treasury in each of the years 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 were 40, 43 and 63, respectively. The reasons for leaving were as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Resignations	13	12	19
Retirements	10	6	9
Permanent transfers to other Government Departments	17	25	35
TOTAL	40	43	63

VAT (Safety Clothing and Footwear)

46. Sir John Farr asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received seeking the removal of value added tax from industrial safety clothing and footwear; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I replied to a question by my hon. Friend about value added tax on safety clothing and footwear for those engaged in forestry on 10 June at columns 168-69. That apart, no recent representations have been received on this subject.

Taxation and National Insurance

47. Mr. Redmond asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the proportion of revenue from income in taxes and national insurance compares to 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In 1985, income tax and national insurance contributions were 42·3 per cent. of central Government current receipts, compared with 46·2 per cent. in 1979.

Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of his gross wage a single person earning half the average wage pays in income tax and national insurance contributions.

Mr. Norman Lamont: 25·8 per cent. in 1986-87.

Taxpayers (Social Security Benefit)

49. Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the number of standard rate taxpayers in the northern region in receipt of social security benefit.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is estimated that in 1984-85 there were just over 1 million basic rate taxpayers in the northern region. Of these, about half a million received some form of social security benefit and a quarter of this group drew an income-related benefit.

North Sea (Fiscal Regime)

53. Mr. Kennedy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received seeking alterations to the fiscal regime in so far as it affects the North Sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Since the Budget, 11 letters have been received seeking alterations to the fiscal regime following the fall in oil prices. These have been studied with interest, but we remain to be convinced that any relaxation is needed to a regime which is already sensitive to oil price movements.

Interest Rates

55. Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the level of interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Base rates have been reduced by 2½ per cent. since the Budget.

57. Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the current level of real interest rates.

58. Mr. Haynes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the level of real interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Our aim is to maintain, on average, a level of short-term interest rates that will deliver the monetary conditions needed to reduce inflation.

Income Tax

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on minimum and maximum income tax rates in (a) the United States of America, (b) Sweden and (c) France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The current minimum and maximum rates on the income tax scales are:

	Minimum percentage	Maximum percentage
United States of America	11	50
Sweden	34	80
France	5	65

Tax Evasion

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will state the number of staff in the Treasury assigned to uncover tax evasion and related fraud, in each of the years 1979-80 to 1985-86;

(2) what was the estimated cost to the Exchequer of tax evasion and related fraud, in the years 1979-80 to 1985-86, in each tax bracket;

(3) what was the average sum involved in tax evasion cases in 1984-85; and in those cases investigated what was the average amount of money recovered;

(4) how many Inland Revenue staff are based in Leeds, and how many of these are assigned to detecting and investigating tax evasion and related fraud;

(5) how many cases of tax evasion in Leeds have been prosecuted over the past five years; and what was the average amount of money involved;

(6) if he will publish his assessment of the incidence of tax evasion as a proportion of total numbers of tax payers in the years 1979-80 to 1985-86;

(7) if he will state the number of tax evasion and related fraud cases resulting in prosecution in 1984-85 and the number of prosecutions as a proportion of the total number of cases discovered.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Health Education and Housing

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review Government policy towards public spending on health education and housing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

EEC (Freedom of Movement)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place within the Economic and Financial Council of the European Economic Communities on, and what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards, the harmonisation of income taxation provisions with respect to freedom of movement for workers within the Community; and if he will take steps to publicise these proposals in the United Kingdom

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986, c. 469]: There has been no discussion in the Economic and Finance Council on this proposal for a directive, although from time to time the proposal has been considered in a working party of officials from member states of the Community.

The Government's attitude remains that set out in the explanatory memorandum of February 1980. Briefly, the Government consider that the draft directive creates difficulties of principle and introduces unnecessary complications for employers and tax authorities.

The proposed directive was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 26 January 1980. The Government have received a number of representations on it.

Tax Units

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax units aged (a) under 16 years, (b) 16 years, (c) 17 years and (d) 18 years, respectively, made use of their personal allowance; and what was the average tax allowance use in (a) to (d) for the latest available year.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986, c.469]: I regret that the information requested is not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Dog Licences

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to publish his response to the consultation paper on dog licences.

Mrs. Rumbold: We will announce our conclusions as soon as possible.

Listed Buildings (Demolition)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average time it now takes to arrange a public inquiry into the proposed demolition of a listed building.

Mr. Tracey: The information requested is not available. If my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind, I would be willing to look into it.

West Yorkshire Metropolitan County Council

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the estimated value of the West Yorkshire metropolitan county councils county hall complex in Wood Street, Wakefield, West Yorkshire, at the time of the abolition of this council on 31 March.

Mr. Tracey: The West Yorkshire residuary body has asked the district valuer for his view of the value of County hall. His report is awaited.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons convicted under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 have subsequently been granted licences under that Act.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not readily available and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

Drinking Water

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the water authorities in which the quality of drinking water is below the minimum standards laid down by the EEC and provide an estimate of the number of consumers in each area who are affected.

Mrs. Rumbold: All supplies meet most of the standards set in the EC directive relating to the Quality of Water intended for Human Consumption (80/778 EEC). Estimates of population in England receiving water which may not be meeting one or more of the standards are listed by water authority area.

Water authority area	Estimate of water authority and water company consumers affected millions
Anglian	1·5
Northumbrian	1·0
North West	2·0
Severn Trent	2·8
Southern	0·1
South West	0·6
Thames	0·8
Yorkshire	2·0

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the areas where bacterial pollution of drinking water or pollution by heavy metals or fluorine salts means that the quality is significantly below the standards laid down by the European Community.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) of 21 October 1985 at column 95 in relation to bacterial pollution, and to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) of 24 April 1986 at columns 235 and 236 in relation to lead. No public supplies in England contain other heavy metals or fluorine salts at levels which fail to meet Community standards.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide his estimate of the amount of capital expenditure needed by each water authority in order to bring drinking water supplies up to European minimum standards within the next five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: Investment directed to achieving compliance with EC drinking water standards has not been identified separately from other investment. Many schemes, particularly in the field of water mains and service reservoir replacement and rehabilitation, have more than one purpose and their cost cannot be wholly attributed to the need to comply with EC standards. However, certain water treatment investment can be almost wholly attributed to achieving these standards. In their 1986 corporate plans, English water authorities are proposing to spend about £100 million over the four-year plan period on investment directed towards achieving compliance with the EC drinking water directive.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of people in England and Wales who receive supplies of drinking water which are either usually or frequently below the standards laid down by the European Community.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction on 9 December 1985 at column 466 to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the principal pollutants of the public drinking water supply; and if he will list those pollutants which appear in such supply to an extent which exceeds the standards laid down by the European Community.

Mrs. Rumbold: Many substances naturally present in the ground as well as those added by human activities become pollutants as their concentrations increase in water. The principal potential pollutants in public water supplies are lead, aluminium and nitrate. They appear in some supplies at concentrations which exceed the maximum admissible concentration laid down in the EC Directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption. Where there is a health risk or where the directive requires action to be taken, programmes of improvement are in train.

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action is being taken in each water authority area to ensure that drinking water supplies are maintained at a level which meets the minimum standards set down by the European Community.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 21 October 1985 at columns 94 and 95 to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk).

Asbestos

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to finance safe asbestos removal programmes in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce legislation to control asbestos pollution; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what representations he has received asking him to introduce legislation to control asbestos pollution.

Sir George Young: Approximately 20 representations concerning legislation to control asbestos in the environment have been received over the past two years. Legislation controlling atmospheric pollution by asbestos works was introduced in 1983. The Health and Safety (Emissions to Atmosphere) Regulations define asbestos works in schedule 1 and require that the best practicable means are used to control emissions of noxious or offensive substances, including asbestos, and to render harmless and inoffensive any such substances which are emitted. Disposal of asbestos waste is controlled by the Council of Pollution Act 1974 (Part 1) and associated regulations. My right hon. Friend has no plans for further legislation.

Funds are not made available specifically for asbestos removal programmes, but rate support grant is paid in support of local authoriries' revenue expenditure generally, including expenditure on asbestos. It is not necessary to remove all asbestos from buildings. Asbestos materials which are damaged, deteriorating and releasing dust should be treated or removed. Asbestos materials which are in good condition and are not vulnerable to damage may be left in place safely. The Department published advice to householders on asbestos in December 1983 in the free leaflet "Asbestos in Housing". More detailed advice to local authorities was published in August 1983 in the booklet "Asbestos Materials in Buildings". This booklet has been expanded and updated and a revised version will be published in August this year.

Consultative Council on Local Government Finance

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what items he plans to discuss at the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance on 7 July, and at the special meeting of the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance he is convening at the end of July.

Mr. Ridley: The CCLGF meeting on 7 July will include discussion of the 1986 reports of the expenditure groups and the reports by the grants working group on options for changes to needs assessments.

I have not yet finalised the arrangements for the subsequent meeting of the CCLGF which will discuss the grants working group report on block grant mechanisms, amongst other issues. The secretariat are in consultation on appropriate dates but this will not be held before September.

Acid Rain

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from European Governments concerning acid rain; and what has been his response.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 15 May, I received from the Swiss ambassador a letter addressed to the Secretary of State for the Environment from the President of the Swiss Confederation, on behalf of the 11 countries which adopted a declaration at Saas Fee on 28 April, enclosing the text of that declaration and asking the United Kingdom to consider, inter alia, joining the initiative to establish a new international agreement to reduce nitrogen oxide and hydrocarbon emissions. My right hon. Friend replied on 30 May saying that the United Kingdom would be happy to take part in initial negotiations on a protocol at the next meeting of the Executive Body of the convention on long range transboundary air pollution in November.

The Norwegian Environment Minister, Ms. Sissel Ronbeck, wrote to me on 28 May about the problem of transboundary air pollution and about the proposed European demonstration reprocessing plant at Dounreay. I expect to reply shortly.

Privately Rented Housing

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 22 May regarding the privately rented housing sector.

Mr. Ridley: As soon as possible.

Conservation (Management Agreements)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to respond to the Gould report on management agreements under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 17 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). The Government intend to consult shortly on both the report and its own preliminary conclusions.

Co-operatives

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the effect of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council on the level of funding available for the formation of worker co-operatives; if he will make it his policy to ensure that the level of funding available for this purpose matches that available prior to 31 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department does not keep records of the amount of funding available for the formation of worker co-operatives since such funding is provided at the discretion of local authorities. The successor borough and district authorities have the same powers to provide such funding as were available to the former GLC and MCCs.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation increasing the level of moneys that may be raised under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 from 2p to 4p in the pound for the purpose of funding worker co-operatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The report of the committee of inquiry into the conduct of local authority business — the Widdicombe report—was laid before Parliament today. This recommends that the limit for spending under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 for the councils of the London boroughs and metropolitan districts be immediately increased from the product of a 2p rate to the product of a 4p rate. My right hon. Friend is looking carefully at the justification for this recommendation.

Regional Planning

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, following his consultation on a draft letter of regional strategic guidance for the south-east, he is now in a position to issue final guidance to planning authorities in the region.

Mr. Ridley: I have today written to Lord Sandford, chairman of the London and south-east regional planning conference, setting out the strategic guidance that I consider necessary at this stage for the review and updating of structure plans in the south-east region. I have sent copies of my letter to hon. Members for constituencies in the south-east and a copy has been placed in the Library.

Widdicombe Report

Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the Widdicombe report; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have today laid before the House a copy of the report of the committee of inquiry into the conduct of local authority business, the Widdicombe report.

I should like to thank Mr. David Widdicombe, and his fellow members on the committee, most sincerely for their report. The committee's study has been a thorough one, and its report is impressive in the extent of its coverage and the scope of its findings.

It is also radical in content. Major changes are proposed to deal with the impact of greater politicisation on the conduct of local government business.

The Government believe that the report will stimulate wide-ranging debate. We wish to encourage that debate, and to weigh its outcome before reaching a view on the committee's proposals.

I am therefore issuing an invitation today to all interested parties to let me have their views. I am determined that the time scale for this will be adequate. We shall be looking for substantive responses by the end of this year.

I commend the committee for its major study, and I look forward to the considered response of the public.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Whitfield asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to maintain detailed separate statistics as to the number of visitors from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan who are admitted into the United Kingdom as a result of the representations of hon. Members.

Mr. Waddington: No. Statistics are maintained of the number of cases in which right hon. and hon. Members have made representations against a decision by an immigration officer to refuse entry to a passenger seeking admission to the United Kingdom. These will include the cases in which, following representations, it is decided that the refusal of entry should be withdrawn and leave to enter granted, but figures of the various nationalities involved will not be kept on a routine basis.

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice has been issued to officials of the immigration service involved in interviewing those who may be charged with a criminal offence since the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into force.

Mr. Waddington: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 11 June 1986 at cols. 177-78.

Nationality

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend or repeal the British Nationality Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The British Nationality Act 1981 provides a sound and equitable basis for establishing nationality according to a person's links with this country or its dependent territories. The Government have no plans to amend or repeal the Act and believe that repeal would be irresponsible and damaging to community relations.

Mr. Gerry Gable

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the nature and scope of any public investigations into the allegation that there has been a plot to intimidate, kidnap or murder Mr. Gerry Gable of "Searchlight" magazine.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member's question on 11 April at column 195.

Chernobyl

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the implications for the level of resources devoted to civil protection of the Chernobyl disaster.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I answered questions from my hon. Friend on 13 May at column 402 and from my hon. Friend the Member for Wansdyke (Mr. Aspinwall) on 22 May at column 257. The subject has also been raised during the consideration of the Civil Protection in Peacetime Bill and in a number of letters received in the Department.

Natural Disasters

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning the training of civil protection officers in England and Wales in connection with problems arising from natural disasters.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is primarily for local authorities to consider the training needs of their emergency planning officers. General advice on natural disasters is given in section 23 of the emergency planning guidance to local authorities, and many of the courses available at the Civil Defence College have considerable relevance to the problems caused by peacetime emergencies.

Arrests

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will issue guidance to chief officers of police to the effect that persons who are arrested and subsequently released without charge are offered assistance in travelling home; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There is no requirement on the police to assist an arrested person to return after his release either to his home or to the place where he was arrested. As a matter of good practice, however, most police forces offer assistance in cases where the suspect is released without charge. We are at present considering with chief officers of police whether central guidance on this issue would be helpful. I shall write to my hon. Friend in due course to let him know the outcome.

Police Manpower

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the latest figures for total police manpower; and if he will indicate what increase this represents compared with 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 April 1986, there were 121,127 police officers and 39,610 civilian staff, so that the total manpower in the police service in England and Wales had increased by 14,615 (9,634 police officers and 4,981 civilians) since May 1979.

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are in service at the latest convenient date; how this compares with the number in service at May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 30 April 1986, the strength of the police service in England and Wales was 121,127, an increase of 9,634 since May 1979.

Data Protection

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Meirionnyd Nant Conwy, Official Report, 22 May, column 260, when he expects to hear of the arrangements the Data Protection Registrar has made for the issuing of information concerning the act in the Welsh language.

Mr. Waddington: The Data Protection Registrar expects to receive translations of his registration forms shortly. There are, however, some practical issues still to be considered in relation to the handling of forms in the Welsh language and the registrar is not yet able to say when he will be able to bring the forms into use or to issue further guidance in Welsh.

Dr. Frank Skuse

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has given consideration to the evidence given by the Home Office forensic scientist, Dr. Frank Skuse, at the trial of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings in the light of recent experiments conducted by Dr. Brian Caddy, head of the forensic science unit at the University of Strathclyde.

Mr. Hurd: I am considering this in the context of representations about the case.

Drink-Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to continue the option of a blood test currently offered to those tested for suspected drink-driving; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of recent trials.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On 25 June 1985 at columns 342-43 the then Home Secretary announced that the non-statutory blood or urine option would be continued for a further period and that the position would be reviewed in 12 months. That review is now under way and the outcome will be announced in due course.

Mr. Werner Bruckhausen

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Werner Bruckhausen was extradited from the United Kingdom on 13 June contrary to undertakings given to his representatives by his Department.

Mr. Hurd: The representations made on Mr. Bruckhausen's behalf on 13 June did not add to the arguments which had already been fully considered. No undertakings were given by officials of this Department to the effect that Mr. Bruckhausen would not be extradited on that date.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to the letter of 21 May regarding the passport of a constituent in Short Heath, Willenhall.

Mr. Waddington: I presume the hon. Member is referring to his letter of 21 April to my right hon. Friend, since when an inquiry has been made of the hon. Member to establish precise particulars of his constituent. I will write to him shortly.

Anwara Begum

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Anwara Begum of 76 Clifden road, E.5, was removed from the United Kingdom before his Department had replied to letters on the case from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, dated 21 May and 11 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that following the receipt of written representations from the hon. Member the instruction to the immigration service to cancel the removal directions in this case was not implemented. Inquiries are being made into why this occurred and I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Mohammed Aslam

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to reach a decision in the case of Mr. Mohammed Aslam, a passenger from Islamabad, who has been in detention at Heathrow since 11 May;

(2) if he will state the reasons for (a) the detention since 11 May at the detention centre, Heathrow, of Mr. Mohammed Aslam, a passenger from Islamabad and (b) the failure to inform Mr. Aslam and his cousin, Mr. Mohammed Akram, of Heckmondwike, West Yorkshire, of reasons for delay in the case.

Mr. Waddington: I wrote on 18 June to the constituency Member who had made representations on Mr. Aslam's behalf. Mr. Aslam was detained because the risk of his failing to comply with the terms of temporary admission was considered to be unacceptably high. Since his arrival four inquiries about detention from Mr. Aslam's representatives have been answered by the port. The constituency Member has been kept informed about the case by my Private Office.

Hippy Convoy

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a report from the chief constable of Hampshire setting out a schedule of the summonses and charges brought against members of the so-called hippy convoy whilst they were in Hampshire; and what information he has as to the penalties so far imposed by the courts.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 13 June 1986, c. 323]: The chief constable informs me that up to 10 June proceedings had been instituted against 69 people associated with the convoy whilst it was in Hampshire. Sixty-one people were charged, and nine people (including one of those charged) were proceeded against by way of summons. The alleged offences included motoring offences, public order offences, obstructing or assaulting the police, obstructing the highway, drugs offences and criminal damage. In the cases heard up to 10 June, the penalties on conviction included fines, binding-over orders and conditional discharges. The highest fine was £200.

Drug Offences

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals in the past five years, charged with supplying heroin, were bailed on their first appearance in court.

Mr. Clay: asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in the past 12 months have been granted bail after being charged with offences related to the supply of heroin.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 17 June 1986]: The information which can be provided without incurring disproportionate cost is given in the following table; separate figures are not available for offences involving heroin.

Persons proceeded against in magistrates' courts for supplying or offering to supply a controlled drug by type of remand*
England and Wales

Type of remand during magistrates' court proceedings	Number of persons
	1983	1984
Granted bail	672	915
Remanded in custody†	179	442
Not remanded	344	392
Total	1,195	1,749

* Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 section 4(3).
† Including those who were given bail at some stage of the magistrates' court proceedings but who were also remanded in custody.

TRANSPORT

Leadenham Bypass

Mr. Douglas Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement as to his plans for a bypass for Leadenham.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received a report by consultants on possible alignments for the bypass and hope to announce our intentions for further investigation and design work shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Development Assistance

Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount of net official development assistance provided by Britain to developing countries in 1985 as a percentage of gross national product.

Mr. Raison: In 1985 Britain provided net official development assistance equivalent to 0·34 per cent. of GNP, not 0·33 per cent. as announced to the House on 7 May. The earlier figure did not take full account of the amounts which Britain contributed to European Community aid programmes financed from the Community budget in 1985; overall the underestimation was about £30 million.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Barristers

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Attorney-General if the Lord Chancellor intends to set up a pay review body for remuneration to barristers for criminal legal aid work for 1987 onwards.

The Solicitor-General: I have nothing at present to add to the Lord Chancellor's statement in another place on 4 June last.

WALES

Auxiliary Nursing Staff

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information his Department has about the use by Welsh health authorities of agency staff, nursing assistants or nursing auxiliaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Some small use of agency nursing staff has been made by authorities in the past, but not on a regular basis. It is not possible accurately to distinguish between the two categories in the nursing auxiliary-nursing assistant grade. The use and deployment of particular categories of staff are operational matters for the health authority concerned.

Youth Training

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of people presently employed in or about to leave the various YTS schemes in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The latest available figure relates to young people in training on YTS at 31 May. At this date it is estimated that there were 16,234 trainees.

Community Industry

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many young people are presently engaged in community industry schemes in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: At 8 May 811 young people were engaged in community industry schemes in Wales.

16 and 17-year-olds

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total population of economically active 16 and 17-year-olds in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Preliminary results from the 1985 "Labour Force Survey" indicate that, in the spring of 1985, there were about 45,000 economically active persons aged 16 and 17 resident in Wales. This survey is based on a sample of some 2,500 private households in Wales and includes students with remunerative employment.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Economic and Financial Council

Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will report on the latest meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council.

Mr. Lawson: The EC Economic and Finance Council met in Luxembourg on 16 June. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council discussed the report of the Ad Hoc Group on the removal of fiscal barriers. The Council asked the Commission to present, by 1 April 1987, detailed proposals on rate structures and on the accompanying systems which in the Commission's view are necessary for the completion of the internal market. This will help the member states to assess the Commission's approach, particularly in respect of its wider budgetary, economic, social and industrial implications.

The Council had a general discussion on the liberalisation of capital movements in the Community, in particular on the recent proposals by the European Commission for the achievement of full liberalisation by 1992. There was general support for the Commission's objectives. This topic will be given priority during the forthcoming United Kingdom Presidency of the Community, and it is hoped that in the first instance a new Council Directive designed to extend the current liberalisation obligations can be adopted by the Council later this year.

The Council considered the Community's economic and financial relations with Japan and, in preparation for the European Council later this month, the general economic situation in the Community. The Council expects to return to the latter question at its meeting in July.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government intend to take in the light of the report of the United Nations Secretary General to the Security Council dated 12 June that the Greek Cypriots have refused his latest proposed draft agreement for the Cyprus problem and regarding the dangers of the present situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We continue to stand ready to do all we can in support of the United Nations Secretary General's initiative. We have made clear our disappointment that one party in the Cyprus dispute has not felt able to accept his proposals. We agree with the Secretary General that all parties to the dispute must now reflect carefully on the way forward. We urge them not to take any action which could make the present situation worse.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the Republic of Cyprus in relation to the continued division of the island; what account has been taken by Her Majesty's Government in relation to such representations of resolutions passed by the United Nations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We have made clear to the Government of the Republic of Cyprus our disappointment that only one side in the dispute has so far felt able to accept the Secretary General's latest proposals for a unified federal Cyprus. The Secretary General's proposals take account of the relevant United Nations resolutions. We continue strongly to support his efforts.

Direct Broadcasting by Satellite (British Council)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies his Department has made of the possible application of direct broadcasting by satellite to the work of the British Council.

Mr. Renton: We have made no studies of the possible application of direct broadcasting by satellite to the work of the British Council. But we fully recognise the importance of being in the forefront of the new technology in the field of foreign policy and propose to study its application in an inter-departmental committee.

Single European Act

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in respect of each of the three principal parts of the decision of the Ministers of the European Economic Community taken on the occasion of the signing of the Single European Act on 28 February last, he will list the steps he is taking to secure compliance with the Ponsonby rule in relation to ratification.

Mrs. Chalker: The decision adopted by Foreign Ministers of the Twelve on the occasion of the signing of the Single European Act sets out procedures for the practical application of certain aspects of title III of the Single European Act. It is not a treaty, is not subject to ratification, and the Ponsonby rules do not apply. It has been placed in the Library of the House for the information of hon. Members.

Fathers Svarinskas and Tamkevicius

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Russian authorities about the imprisonment of two Lithuanian priests, Father Svarinskas and Father Tamkevicius.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) on 17 June, at column 489.

ENVIRONMENT

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his policy for preventing the spread by rodents of radioactive contamination from low level nuclear waste disposal sites.

Mrs. Rumbold: We do not consider this to be a problem in practice.

Water Fittings and Pipes

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to prohibit the sale of water fittings and pipes which do not conform to British safety standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. The need for such legislation has not been shown.

Sport

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Press officers liaise with the Minister for sport in connection with matters within his responsibility for sport.

Mr. Tracey: One officer in the Department's information directorate deals with sports matters along with other areas of the Department's responsibility.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil servants work directly for the Minister of sport: what is their grade; and what is their total cost per annum.

Mr. Tracey: Twenty officials work in the Department's sport and recreation division providing advice for Ministers on sport and recreation matters. The grades of these officials are—assistant secretary (1), principal (2), higher executive officer (5), executive officer (7), clerical officer (4) and senior personal secretary (1). Their total cost per annum is £217,300. In addition, the four staff in my private office have some dealings with these matters, along with the other areas of the Department's work for which I am responsible.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the places visited by the Minister for Sport during the last 12 months; and what was the purpose of each visit and the cost in each case.

Mr. Tracey: Since September 1985 when I was appointed Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Department of the Environment, I have visited the following places in connection with the part of my ministerial responsibility relating to sport and recreation matters:

This list excludes places visited in connection with my other ministerial responsibilities in support of my noble Friend the Minister of State with responsibilities for planning, heritage and regional affairs. The costs incurred in the case of most domestic visits are not readily available, and could be estimated only at disproportionate cost. The full cost to the Department of the overseas visit to Switzerland was approximately £1,600. The cost to the Department of the visit to Mexico has not yet been finally calculated, but is estimated to be approximately £5,500.

Sports Council (Chairman)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Sports Council; what subjects were discussed; and what is the date of the next meeting.

Mr. Tracey: I meet regularly the chairman of the Sports Council to discuss issues relating to the development of sport. We last met on 7 May, when we discussed a wide range of such issues. Our next meeting is scheduled for 2 July.

National Clean-up Scheme

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement giving details of the national clean-up scheme.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 5 June 1986, c. 613]: I will make a full statement to the House in July, when the details of the new initiative have been completed and when all concerned are ready to launch the new scheme. I have invited a number of established national voluntary organisations to act as agents in launching the initiative, and I am happy to confirm that Mr. Richard Branson, chairman of the Virgin Group has been invited to be chairman of the board.

EMPLOYMENT

Toxic Waste

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Paymaster General (1) how many inspectors there have been at the Health and Safety Executive dealing with toxic waste matters for each year since the establishment of the Health and Safety Executive;

(2) how many inspectors there are at the Health and Safety Executive whose duty it is to deal with toxic waste matters.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available in the form requested. All Health and Safety Executive inspectors may be involved in dealing with toxic waste wherever their work brings them into contact with the handling or storing of toxic materials.

National Insurance Level

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General what has been the increase in the number of employees below the national insurance level since 1983.

Mr. Lang: Precise information is not available. However, evidence from the "New Earnings Survey" and other data suggest that between April 1983 and April 1985 (the latest period for which data on the distribution of earnings are available), the number of employees whose gross weekly earnings were below the limit for national insurance purposes increased by about a third of a million.

Radiation

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Paymaster General why the effective dose equivalent concept and the use of organ weighting factors as recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection was incorporated into the Ionising Radiation Regulations 1985; and whether it is possible under the regulations for a worker to show a lower recorded dose for a given exposure than under the system of dose limitation.

Mr. Trippier: The effective dose equivalent concept, which involves the use of organ weighting factors, was incorporated into the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 because it represented the most recent recommendation of ICRP, was included in EC Directives 80/836/Euratom and 84/467/Euratom which the Regulations implement, and was the advice of the National Radiological Protection Board.

It is not possible for the dose recorded for a worker for a given exposure to be less than that calculated using the ICRP system.

Home Workers

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Paymaster General by what method wages inspectors determine whether or not an employer is employing home workers.

Mr. Trippier: Where records do not show that the services of homeworkers are used, wages inspectors ask employers whether work is given out to any person.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the inspections carried out by the Wages Inspectorate in the period 1979 to 1985 were of home workers.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is given in the table:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Workers
(a) Workers whose pay was checked	244,941	295,491	205,804	287,392	332,853	416,894	300,692

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Paymaster General what representations his Department has received from the National Bureau for Handicapped Students concerning representation on the proposed National Council for Vocational Qualifications; what reply is being sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by the Minister of State at the Department of Education and Science to his identical question concerning similar representations by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science from the National Bureau for Handicapped Students.

ENERGY

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Walker: In the 1983-84 Session 16 Officials and four Ministers from my Department gave evidence to Select Committees of this House. The figures for the 1984-85 Session were 27 and six respectively.

Energy Crops

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy if a report on the work of the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology on native and naturalised species of plant as potential energy crops has been published.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. The report was published in May 1986 by the Energy Technology Support Unit—reference number ETSU/B1086 volumes 1-5. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Council of Energy Ministers

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Council of Energy Ministers which met on 3 June.

Mr. Peter Walker: I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Energy Ministers on 3 June.

The Council discussed the Chernobyl nuclear accident. It emphasised the importance of learning lessons from the accident both internationally and within the Community. It agreed that the appropriate forum for action was the International Atomic Energy Agency. Co-ordination between the Community and its member states should take place within the framework of discussions at the IAEA. It noted that the Commission intended to place a communication before the Council shortly on the consequences of the Chernobyl accident.

Considerable progress was made on the draft regulation establishing a new regime governing the payment of state aids to the coal industry. The only outstanding point concerns the duration of the proposed regime. Once that is settled the Community will have an agreed mechanism enabling the Government to give support to the coal industry for some years ahead. This is an essential condition to bringing the coal industry to economic viability. The Council was unable to agree the proposed Community energy objectives for 1995. I regret that Denmark was not able to accept the wording of the Community's objectives.

The Council agreed the adoption of the draft resolution on the Community orientation to develop new and renewable energy sources, subject to the comments of the European Parliament. This is a useful endorsement of the value of renewable energy sources where they are competitive.

The Council had a further discussion on the oil market situation. It invited the Commission to continue to monitor developments in the market and keep the Council informed. The Community would continue to work towards promoting the opening up of the other major industrial markets so that exports of Middle East refined products are not unduly concentrated on the Community alone.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions, and in which years, and in what amounts, plutonium from British Nuclear Fuels Limited operated reactors at Calder Hall—Chapel Cross has been submitted to (a) EURATOM safeguards and (b) International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to the reply, 13 June 1986, c. 343]: When United Kingdom civil nuclear plutonium became subject to Euratom safeguards in January 1973 the initial declared inventory included material in Calder Hall—Chapel Cross origin then being used in civil research and development work.

A similar situation obtained in August 1978 when the initial inventory of plutonium subject to the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA agreement was declared. Since safeguards were introduced, there have been two additional occasions on which plutonium, in greater than gramme quantities, of Calder Hall—Chapel Cross origin has been submitted for inclusion on the inventory of safeguarded material in the United Kingdom; 545kg in February 1984 and 1·5kg in March 1986. Additionally there has been a number of occasions when quantities of less than one gramme have been submitted for inclusion into the safeguarded inventory.

The current situation is that more than 1¼ tonnes plutonium of Calder Hall—Chapel Cross origin are subject to international safeguards arrangement. This includes some 700kg exported by BNFL. The balance is held by the UKAEA and BNFL.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Deaf People (Teachers)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much money he plans to make available for in-service training of teachers of the deaf.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government intend that support from public funds for the provision of training for teachers of the deaf should continue at a level sufficient to assure the supply of such teachers. The student numbers now allocated to courses of initial teacher training in special educational needs will be transferred to in-service training when intakes to those courses cease. The costs to local authorities who send teachers for in-service training are currently supported through arrangements for the pooling among local authorities of in-service teacher training costs. We intend that these costs should be eligible for support from 1 April 1987 under the new financial arrangements for which we are seeking statutory powers through the Education Bill now before the House.

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the National Bureau for Handicapped Students concerning representations on the proposed National Council for Vocational Qualifications; what reply he is sending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend received on 4 June a letter dated 28 May from the National Bureau for Handicapped Students. The letter called for specific responsibility to be given to one member of the proposed Council for reviewing the needs of people with special needs arising from disability, learning difficulty, and emotional problems. I replied to the letter on 11 June, replying at the same time to a similar letter sent to my right hon. and noble Friend, the Secretary of State for Employment; I am sending a copy of my letter to the right hon. Member.

School Examinations

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many children, expressed as a percentage of the total number leaving at 16, leave school at 16 (a) with no O-levels or CSEs and (b) with no O-levels and CSE grades 4 and below;

(2) if he will give the number of children who have taken O-levels in Hampshire, in what subjects and how many have passed, in the last five years;

(3) if he will give the number of children in Hampshire who have undertaken the CSE examination in the last five years, indicating subjects taken.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 16 June 1986, c. 383]: Information is not available in exactly the form requested. It is estimated that in 1984-85 13·1 per cent. of pupils who left English maintained secondary schools during their minimum school leaving age year had not obtained any graded results in O-levels or CSE examinations. A further 48·4 per cent. achieved one or more results at lower grade(s)† only. On the same basis the percentages for leavers from maintained schools in Hampshire were 8·2 per cent. and 47·8 per cent. respectively.

Information on the number of school leavers, of all ages, from Hampshire maintained schools who attempted, and achieved higher graded O-level/CSE results in, specified subjects or combinations of subjects are:

HOME DEPARTMENT

News International Plant, Wapping

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what police resources from the 'L' Division are being deployed at Wapping.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of officers deployed in policing the News International dispute at Wapping varies from day to day and hour to hour, according to the operational requirement. I understand from the Commissioner that on Saturday 14 June, 42 officers from 'L' District performed duty at Wapping totalling approximately 462 hours.

Immigration

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend or repeal the Immigration Act 1971; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The Immigration Act 1971 provides the necessary framework for firm control over immigration. The Government believe that to repeal the Act would be irresponsible and damaging to community relations.

As my right hon. Friend announced on 23 January, at col. 274, the Government intend to introduce legislation in the lifetime of this Parliament to make overstaying a continuing offence committed on the day when the overstayer first knows that his leave has expired and on any day thereafter on which he remains in the United Kingdom.

The Government also intend, as my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State told the House on 23 July 1985, at col. 894, to introduce legislation to put an end to the sexually discriminatory features of section 1(5) of the Immigration Act in a way that preserves the Government's commitment to firm immigration control: but the Government have no plans to amend the Act in other respects.

Private Landlords (Intruders)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the legal powers available to protect private landowners from reckless intruders.

Mr. Mellor: We are urgently considering whether some further strengthening of the criminal law is required to protect private landowners from trespassers, and shall not hesitate to introduce any necessary changes.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests have been made so far in connection with the current trades dispute at Wapping; if he will give a breakdown of (a) the charges laid against those arrested, (b) the number of charges that have subsequently been dropped, (c) bail conditions imposed by magistrates and (d) the number of convictions that there have been; and what sentences have ensued.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 19 May 1986, c. 12]: I understand from the commissioner that, up to 9 June, 918 people had been arrested in connection with this dispute. Of these, 799 were charged with various offences ranging from threatening behaviour to grievous bodily harm. No charges have been dropped. Bail conditions have included undertakings not to go within a certain distance of the News International plant, and conditions of residence.

Up to 9 June, 474 people had been convicted of offences in connection with the dispute. The sentences included conditional discharges, fines and imprisonment. The highest sentence of imprisonment was 21 days.

PRIME MINISTER

Armed Forces (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) of 17 June, if she will give the terms of reference of the review of ethnic minorities in the armed forces; when it was established; by whom it is being conducted; from whom it has received evidence; and if the results will be published.

The Prime Minister: The possibility of introducing ethnic monitoring to the Armed Forces is being considered as part of their routine duties by those in the Ministry of Defence who are responsible for Service personnel policies and practices. This review is nearing completion. An announcement on this matter will be made in due course.

Department of the Environment (Ministerial Responsibilities)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Prime Minister if there are any plans to reallocate ministerial responsibilities in relation to sport within the Department of the Environment.

The Prime Minister: No.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects a final decision to be made on the operation of the cereals co-responsibility levy in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The cereals coresponsibility levy applies from 1 July to this season's Community grain which undergoes first processing, is exported or is sold into intervention. The operation of the levy in the United Kingdom will be governed by Commission regulations which are expected to be finalised shortly. These will be supplemented by a Statutory Instrument which will be laid before the House as soon as possible thereafter.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding the operation of the cereals co-responsibility levy in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: I have received representations from many different sources. I and my officials are in close consultation with the interested trade organisations on how best to operate the levy in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what he expects to be the yield of the cereals co-responsibility levy in the United Kingdom; and what the yield would be if the levy were extended (a) to all cereals used in animal feed and (b) to all cereals grown in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: It is not possible to predict the yield of the cereals co-responsibility levy in the United Kingdom as this will depend on the size of the harvest and the proportion of that harvest which is processed, exported outside the Community, or put into intervention.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the proportion (a) of total cereals produced in the United Kingdom and (b) of cereals used in animal feed which will be liable for co-responsibility levy; and if he will give information on equivalent figures for the European Community.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at what point in the production process the cereals co-responsibility levy will be applied; and what cereals will be exempt from the levy.

Mr. Jopling: The cereals co-responsibility levy will be collected on Community grown cereals which either undergo first processing, are exported outside the Community or are bought into intervention. Cereals owned by traders or processors and in store on 30 June 1986 from harvests prior to 1986 will be exempt from levy if an exemption certificate is claimed before 7 July. Cereals imported from outside the Community and cereals sold out of intervention will also be exempt from levy.

Medicated Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Murphy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he proposes to take to implement section 40 of the Medicines Act 1968 as amended by section 13 of the Animal Health and Welfare Act 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: The powers afforded by section 13 of the Animal Health and Welfare Act 1984 have already been used to take the first steps to improve controls over the manufacture, sale supply or import of medicated animal feedingstuffs. Statutory consultation is now in progress on further proposals which will simplify the labelling requirements. We now propose to seek the views of representative organisations on the principal measures. Their content has been under discussion with representative organisations for some two and a half years and I believe there is now a large measure of agreement on them. We hope to implement them within two years.

SOCIAL SERVICES

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce the free issue of contraceptive sheaths to patients at National Health Service family planning clinics as a protective measure against the spread of HTLV-III virus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Professional opinions differ about the desirability of making sheaths available in genito-urinary medicine clinics for the control of HTLV-III virus. However, the matter is under careful consideration.

Diabetics

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in view of modern techniques of management of diabetics, he will include blood glucose test strips in the limited list so that these can be prescribed by general practitioners for their National Health Service diabetic patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health on 25 March at column 775.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what plans he has to make the standards of assessment and prescription of wheelchairs more consistent;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of disabled people using unsuitable or unsafe wheelchairs.

Mr. Newton: The models of wheelchair issued by the Department meet standards of stability and durability and other safety requirements such as fire retardancy, and none is inherently unsafe. The suitability of a wheelchair for a particular individual is a matter of professional judgment. In reaching decisions about the recommendations of the McColl report I shall have in mind the scope for improving assessment and prescribing practices.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to introduce a low-cost, low-performance wheelchair into the range in the near future.

Mr. Newton: An initial order has been placed for one new model of lower-cost pushchair for occasional users and arrangements are being made for its introduction and evaluation in use.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the back-up services for wheelchair users.

Mr. Newton: We are actively exploring ways of improving these services in the light of the McColl report.

Artificial Limbs

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he is satisfied with the competition between the British companies which manufacture artificial limbs;

(2) how many British firms supply artificial limbs to amputees in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton: Seven British firms supply artificial limbs in the United Kingdom. The Department is currently consulting the industry about a number of matters including contractual arrangements.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what complaints he has recently received about the artificial limb and appliance centre services; and what response he has made.

Mr. Newton: Twenty three specific complaints have been received by Ministers since 1 January and answered individually. No central record is kept of complaints made direct to centres. The figure does not include some 50 written responses to our invitation to comment on the McColl report or other suggestions for the development of the services.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of people who have attended the artificial limb and appliance centres in each of the last five years.

Mr. Newton: The following figures refer to patient attendances at artificial limb and appliance centres in England:

Year	Attendances
1981	183,840
1982	191,820
1983	195,800
1984	192,650
1985	189,730

Note The centres supply wheelchairs to many people without the necessity of personal attendance.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to make a statement in response of the McColl report on artificial limbs and appliance centre services.

Mr. Newton: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) on Monday 16 June at column 460.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what is the cost over the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available of unemployment and other benefits related to unemployment in Portsmouth.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that officials of his Department promulgate the position regarding the right to supplementary benefit for Easter school leavers as set out in the answer to the hon. Member for Birkenhead, 12 June, Official Report, column 303, in advice to potential claimants and in interviews and briefings with the media; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member's question and my reply to him on 12 June at column 303 referred to the benefit entitlement of young people leaving school at Whitsun and not to those who left school at Easter. The Chief Adjudication Officer's guidance for adjudication officers in local offices on the entitlement of school leavers in general to supplementary benefit is contained in the published "S Manual" paragraphs 2251-2292. Advice on Easter school leavers in particular is contained in circular S51/85.

Childhood Cancers

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he is providing for the study of childhood cancers.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Department supports the Childhood Cancer Research Group based at the Radcliffe infirmary, Oxford on the basis of a six-year rolling contract. The Group's financial allocation in 1986-87 amounts to £153,600 to which the Scottish Home and Health Department will contribute 10 per cent. The Department is also providing financial support in 1986-87 for the following research projects:

1. Case Control Study of Leukaemia and Lymphoma in Young People in West Cumbria—£19,800.
2. Birth Cohort Study in West Cumbria—£1,873.
3. Analysis of Cancer Incidence in Young People in Small Areas—£44,000.

Additionally the Department is giving £368,000 in 1986-87 to provide nursing support for trials in childhood leukaemia carried out by the Medical Research Council.

The Medical Research Council is the major Government-funded body supporting cancer research, including research into childhood cancers. It receives its annual grant-in-aid from the Science Vote of the Department of Education and Science.

Cancer (Sellafield)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the report on medical aspects of radiation from the Committee looking at the incidence of cancer near Sellafield.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) on 18 February at column 115.

Alternative Medicine

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies he is making of the British Medical Association's report on alternative medicine; and if he will make a statement about the provision of alternative medicine on the National Health Service.

Mr. Whitney: The Department is considering the Report of the British Medical Association's board of science working party on alternative therapy. Medical practitioners in the National Health Service can offer to use any form of treatment, including alternative therapies, which they consider to be in the interests of their patients and which they feel competent to provide.

Waiting Lists

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to reduce waiting lists, particularly for surgery.

Mr. Whitney: We have made it clear that the reduction of waiting times for operations is a priority for both the National Health Service Management Board and for health authorities. We expect to issue further guidance on the subject shortly.

Health Resources

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the recommendations of (a) the Acheson report on the distribution of health services resources and (b) the Black report on inequalities in health provision have now been implemented.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 12 December 1985 at columns 767-68 and to my predicessor's reply to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) on 14 May 1985 at column 110.

Maternity Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what he estimates will be the expenditure under his new system of maternity payments for low income families additional to current expenditure on supplementary benefit single payments for maternity needs;

(2) what estimates he is able to make of the overall effect on public expenditure of the abolition of the maternity grant.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986, c. 302]: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Lady on 20 May at column 166.

Bethlem Royal and Maudsley Special Health Authority

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage change there has been in the revenue allocation to the Bethlem Royal and Maudsley special health authority in the last six years.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 12 June 1986, c. 302]: Revenue expenditure by the Bethlem and Maudsley special health authority increased by 125·9 per cent. in cash terms between 1978-79 and 1984-85, representing an increase in real terms of 27·2 per cent., after taking account of general inflation as measured by the gross domestic product deflator. This increase includes additional revenue allocated to the health authority over several years for the development of its interim secure unit and district services unit, which provide services for the South East Thames regional health authority. The revenue allocation to the SHA was £16·9 million in 1985-86 and £18 million in 1986-87. The SHA has recently been allocated a further £87,000 as part of the £50 million addition to health authority cash limits in England following the pay awards to review body staff announced recently.

TRANSPORT

Roads (Construction)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all road construction contracts which his Department intends to award in 1986-87, showing in each case the total value of the contract and the expenditure likely to be incurred in that year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is set out below. The national road construction contracts actually let in 1986-87 may differ somewhat from this list, depending on the progress of outstanding statutory and other procedures. Other schemes not listed may start in 1986-87 if progress with their procedures is faster than currently expected.

Note: The works cost estimates given are pre-tender estimates of the cost of the road schemes. In addition to the works contract, they include ancillary items such as statutory undertakers fees. The actual value of the contracts when let may differ from those quoted above.

Select Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) officials and (b) Ministers from his Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in each of the Sessions (i) 1983-84 and (ii) 1984-85.

Mr. Moore: Eight officials and three Ministers from my Department gave evidence to Commons Select Committees in the 1983-84 Session, and 21 officials and three Ministers in the 1984-85 Session.

A6 (Streatley)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will reconsider his decision not to provide a roundabout on the junction of the A6 trunk road and Church road, Streatley, in the light of recent accidents in that area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am satisfied that the decision was correct. The junction conforms with current design standards, and the provision of a roundabout cannot be justified by the one personal injury accident reported in the last three years.

There have since 1983 been six personal injury accidents at the junction of the A6 with Sharpenhoe road, Streatley just to the south of Church road. The accidents occurred at night, and five involved vehicles turning right from Sharpenhoe road onto the A6. Lighting was installed on this section of the A6 earlier this year which should contribute to increased safety at the junction. Bedfordshire county council is also proposing to prohibit all vehicular turning movements from the side road onto the trunk road, although I understand that there have been objections to the draft Statutory Order.

Bridges

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the results of his Department's study of the compliance of bridges with the standards laid down in BD21/84, the assessment of highway bridges and structures.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The results of the sample survey, which will provide information on the extent of compliance of public road bridges owned by local authorities, railways and British Waterways, are expected to be available this summer.

M1 (Telephones)

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that when his officals check the telecommunications system at Rothersthorpe service station on the southbound carriageway of the M1 motorway particular attention is paid to telephone numbers Northampton 830668, 830185 and 830585.

Mr. Moore: My officials have now checked these telephones, two of which were found not to be working. The operator has agreed to inform the Department of progress by British Telecom in restoring the service.

Road Traffic Law Review

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to publish the road traffic law review.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The review is currently taking evidence and hopes to produce its final report around the turn of the year. We would expect to publish it as soon as possible.

Motorways (Nearside Lanes)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to encourage more motorway drivers to drive on the nearside lanes of motorways by a publicity campaign and appropriate motorway signs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department takes every opportunity to remind motorists that they should use the outer lanes on motorways for overtaking only and return to the nearside lane as soon as it is safe to do so.

A total of 23 million leaflets on lane discipline have been issued with vehicle excise duty documents. We plan to issue a further 9 million this year. Experimental "keep left" signs have been installed on the M1. Their impact is to be monitored.

Passenger Transport Authorities

Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance he has issued to the passenger transport authorities on future levels of expenditure.

Mr. Moore: Although I do not intend to determine expenditure levels for 1987-88 formally under the Rates Act 1984 for the Passenger Transport Authorities until July, certain of the authorities have asked me for provisional and informal early guidance on likely levels of expenditure for 1987-88 and 1988-89. Accordingly my Department has today written to each PTA with such guidance, and I have arranged for copies of those letters to be available in the House of Commons Library. This guidance is intended simply to give the authorities an indication of the order of expenditure which appears in the light of present information to be consistent with the Government's policy objectives. The authorities will of course have full opportunities to submit their views on the appropriate levels of expenditure under the normal procedures laid down by the Rates Act, and I will give very careful consideration to any such views at the appropriate time.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Local Enterprise Development Units

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of (a) projects, (b) manufacturing jobs (c) service jobs and (d) enterprise grants, promoted by local enterprise development units in each local enterprise development unit region since 1980-81 and the average cost per job.

Dr. Boyson: Government assistance to small businesses in Northern Ireland is channelled through a single organisation, the Local Enterprise Development Unit. LEDU operates on an area basis with offices in Londonderry, Newry, Omagh and Belfast, where its headquarters is also situated.

The following table sets out the numbers of (a) projects, (b) manufacturing jobs, (c) service jobs and (d) enterprise grants promoted by the Local Enterprise Development Unit in each of its four areas since 1980-81.

	Londonderry Office Northern Area	Newry Office Southern Area	Belfast Office Eastern Area	Omagh Office Western Area
(a) No of projects	606	579	1,308	388
(b) No of manufacturing jobs	2,123	2,489	5,750	1,630
(c) No of service jobs	436	611	2,017	395
(d) No of Enterprise Grants (In existence since end 1982)	336	245	434	164

The average cost per job over the period is £4,057.

Industrial Assistance

Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list, by country of origin, the firms in receipt of Government assistance that have opened or closed in Northern Ireland for the period for which data is available.

Dr. Boyson: The following list shows firms (142 in all) which opened in the period 1972 to 1985 with assistance from the Industrial Development Board or its predecessor, the Department of Commerce. Those asterisked subsequently closed.

In addition, in the period 1979-80 to 1985-86 inclusive, the Local Enterprise Development Unit assisted 2,163 small firms, almost exclusively of Northern Ireland origin and in many cases one-man businesses, to begin operating. Information on LEDU-assisted firms which closed in the period is not available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Protective Paints

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from the British paint industry as to standards applied to protective paints for bridges and similar steel structures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

International Paint wrote to me on 19 May proposing that the Department's specification be amended to permit the use of new paint system that require fewer coats. I have asked for full details so that the technical and economical merits of the proposal can be thoroughly examined.

SCOTLAND

Forestry

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether he will take steps to require private forestry companies to include recreational provision in any large scale planting scheme which benefits from forestry planting grants;

(2) whether he will make it his policy to adopt an integrated approach to agriculture and forestry in the uplands and lowlands of the United Kingdom;

(3) whether he has any plans to meet the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss alternative methods in controlling forestrty planting;

(4) if he will publish in the Official Report Her Majesty's Government's conservation and landscape strategy in relation to forestry and woodlands;

(5) if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the various broadleaved assistance schemes in reversing the decline of decidous woodlands.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will consider setting up a system of national financial support for forestry industry projects.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No. The Government make available regional development grants and regional selective assistance in suitable cases to firms in the manufacturing or service sectors which invest in the assisted areas. The Government's policy concentrates resources on the areas of greatest need, in particular those with the highest rates of unemployment. Projects of particular national importance and benefit can, in exceptional cases, receive assistance regardless of location within the United Kingdom. In addition the Scottish Development Agency and Highlands and Islands Development Board can offer help and advice for new projects within their respective areas.

Upland Land Use

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to meet the Forestry Commission, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the National Farmers' Union and other interested parties to discuss the objectives of Her Majesty's Government's upland land use policies.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so at present. Close contact at all levels is maintained with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the National Farmers' Union for Scotland and various other bodies which have an interest in upland land use. The Forestry Commission is of course a department of government which reports to my right hon. and learned Friend and to the other Forestry Ministers.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a statement setting out Her Majesty's Government's policy objectives on upland land use.

Mr. Ancram: The Government's policy objectives on upland land use are directed towards maintaining a balance between the economic and social needs of the rural communities in terms of a healthy agricultural industry and of other activities, such as forestry, conservation and recreation, which contribute to these communities' economic and social well being.

Female Police Surgeons

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 9 June, Official Report, column 33, what has been the numerical result to date in terms of the recruitment of female police surgeons since the issue of his departmental circular in November 1985 to each of the police authorities listed.

Mr. John Mackay: No additional female police surgeons have yet been appointed, since the process of identifying women doctors who are prepareed to undertake this work, training them and appointing them formally takes time; but chief constables are actively seeking to recruit.

Scottish Islands (Agricultural Development Programme)

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on current progress towards an agricultural development programme for the Scottish islands, indicating the likely timetable of events and date of implementation.

Mr. John Mackay: The ADP regulation was formally approved on 6 May by the Council of Minsters in Brussels. The way is now clear for wide-ranging consultations to be put in hand with interested parties on the detailed contents of the programme to be submitted to the European Commission.

Given the wide geographical spread of the islands included within the scope of the ADP and the diversity of agricultural conditions to be taken into consideration, the consultative process and the subsequent preparation of the programme will clearly be major and time consuming tasks. I envisage however that the ADP will be in operation before the end of 1987.

Stobhill Hospital Maternity Unit

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of the representations made to the Greater Glasgow health board by the Faculty of Medicine at Glasgow university regarding the proposed closure of Stobhill hospital maternity unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Mackay: I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library. When a health board proposes to close a hospital facility it is required to consult widely with all interested parties and, having done so, submit its formal case to the Secretary of State for his approval. In reaching a view, my right hon. and learned Friend and I will take full account of the representations which have been received both by him and by the board during their consultation process, from organisations and individuals in the area affected by the board's proposal.

Childhood Cancers

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if any increase in the incidence of childhood cancers has been observed in west Thurso, west central Edinburgh and south-west Perth.

Mr. John Mackay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were registered as unemployed in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each year since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 29]: On 8 May 1986 the number of unemployed people claiming benefit in (a) Greenock and Port Glasgow parliamentary constituency, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland was 8,841, 193,279 and 351,572 respectively. Comparisons with previous years are not possible because of the several changes in the way unemployment statistics have been compiled since 1979. The information is however available in the Library for the corresponding month of previous years.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many vacancies were available in job centres in (a)

Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow in May 1979, June 1983 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 29]: On 8 May 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of vacancies recorded in jobcentres in Scotland, Strathclyde region and Greenock and Port Glasgow was respectively 20,593, 9,078 and 363. Figures for earlier dates are available in the Library; they are not comparable with the latest information because of changes in the way the statistics are compiled. It is estimated that approximately one-third only of existing vacancies overall are notified to jobcentres.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what specific plans he has to reduce youth unemployment in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 29]: Employment prospects for all unemployed people in Strathclyde and the hon. Member's constituency will best be enhanced, as they will in Scotland as a whole, by improvements in the climate for investment and the encouragement of industrial competitiveness which the Government's policies are designed to achieve.

In the short term, all the Government's employment and training measures, which were considerably expanded in this year's budget, are available to eligible young people in Strathclyde and in Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Among these the recently introduced new workers scheme will boost employmen opportunities for young people by offering employers a possible financial incentive to recuit those uner the age of 21.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of youth unemployment in the Greenock travel-to-work area at the latest date for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and subsequent years.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 29]: In April 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed people aged under 18 in the Greenock and Port Glasgow travel-to-work area was 637. Because of the various changes in the way unemployment statistics have been compiled since 1979, comparisons with previous years would be misleading. The information is, however, available in the Library for the corresponding month (representing end quarter compilations) of previous years.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of long-term unemployment in Greenock and Port Glasgow at the latest date for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in 1979 and subsequent years.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 June 1986, c. 29]: In April 1986, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed people in the Greenock and Port Glasgow parliametary constituency claiming benefit who had been unemployed for 52 weeks or more was 3,925. Because of various changes in the way unemployment statistics have been compiled since 1979, comparisons with previous years would be misleading. The information is however available in the Library for the corresponding month (representing end quarter compilations) of previous years.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 99

SESSION 1985–86

9th June—20th June 1986

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
